KEY TO TV: KEEP 'EM LAUGHING

Hotel Lounges, By Any Other Name, Kayoing Main Rooms in Las Vegas

By FORREST DUKE

Las Vegas, Jan. 2.

The recent success of the Thunderbird lounge, now being booked by Dave Victorson, endorses the arguments of Vegas showmen who predict that within a few years the bulk of entertainment here will be of the lounge variety.

While the Thunderbird show room was closed to prepare for the Monte Proser presentation of "Flower Drum Song" (which preemed Dec. 20), Victorson went to the big name policy in the lounge and signed Billy Daniels, Sonny King and the Vido Musso orch. From the opening night, Daniels & Co. have played to SRO. Before playing the Thunderbird, Daniels had been a solid lounge attraction at the Stardust.

It is the growing belief that main show rooms here will eventually be used for convention halls and miscellaneous attractions, with only such shows as the Stardust's Lido de Paris, the Tropicana's Folies Bergere, and tab versions of Broadway hits keeping the big rooms open.

"The hotels will save about $1,000,000 a year on their entertainment budgets," says Victorson.

Even with stars who do not demand maximum Vegas weekly rates ($25,000 is now the average top, with certain exceptions — Mitzi Gaynor gets $40,000 at the Flamingo, Danny Kaye a similar amount at the Desert Inn), it costs a hotel around $25,000 a week to run the show room. This includes

Claims Brinkley Show Ridiculed Him, Sues NBC, Sponsor for 300G

Detroit, Jan. 2.

Anthony J. Tocco, of suburban Grosse Pointe Park, has filed a $300,000 defamation of character suit in Federal Court against NBC and Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.

Tocco, son of a former Prohibition rumrunner, claims that the NBC-TV David Brinkley show "Crime Does Pay," sponsored by the glass firm, held him, his wife and four children "up to public hatred, shame, contempt, ridicule and disgrace."

The program, shown here Oct. 18, featured films of large homes in the exclusive Grosse Pointe area and claimed they were owned by gangsters or their children. Addresses, but no names, were mentioned. During the filming, residents attacked the cameramen and, for a time, police confiscated the film.

Tocco said the program charged him "with being a gangster, a criminal an illicit user or dealer in narcotics and a member of a lawless group, the so-called Mafia."

Cliburn LP Wins 1st Classical Gold Disk

Van Cliburn's RCA Victor LP of the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-Flat last week became the first classical album to top the 1,000,000 sales mark.

At a special ceremony in New York, Cliburn was presented with two plaques, the Gold Record millionth pressing awarded by Victor and the award representing sales of over $1,000,000 in manufacturer's billing, given by the Record Industry Assn. of America. The disk was cut in May, 1958. Since then he has etched five more albums.

NAB's TV Coders: Violence Declines But Sex Shows Up

Washington, Jan. 2.

"Violence for the sake of violence" declined on television during 1961, but sex reared its head a little more than before.

This was the New Year's world from National Assn. of Broadcasters in reporting results of its TV Code monitoring for the past 12 months. The NAB release summed it up this way:

"A continuing decline in violence for the sake of violence but a slight upsurge in improper portrayals of sex."

Robert D. Swezey, director of NAB's newly established Code Authority, pledged that his office would move to keep the lid on sex "with the same persistent vigor that helped curb the amount of needless violence."

Swezey explained the situation as follows: "These problems come around in cycles and we just have to keep working to solve them."

On the whole, the NAB exec added, broadcasters have "high

HOME FILMS SHOOT NOW IN TECHNICOLOR

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Technicolor, which already provides a processing service for amateur still photographers, finally has got around to making its film available for amateurs and henceforth home movie-makers may shoot in Technicolor.

Project was first visualized by Dr. Herbert T. Kalmus, when he headed company, and brought to fruition by Patrick J. Frawley Jr., board chairman and chief exec officer.

COMEDY SHOWS DOMINATE '61-'62

By GEORGE ROSEN

As television moves into '62, there appears one dominant motif to the current season — the continued success story of the situation comedy. Westerns, private eye shows, live drama, filmed drama, adventure shows, panel shows may be cyclical, but "keep 'em laughing" remains the basic staple of the tv spectrum. Dating back to '50 and the emergence of "I Love Lucy," the situation comedy has continued to hold its own while programs in other categories have had their ups and downs. Like the soap opera in daytime, comedy remains the dominant factor nighttime.

If, as is now established, there are some 50 to 60 half-hour situation comedy shows in development for next season, it's because they've hit an alltime peak in popularity this season, based on the Nielsen nosecounts. For example, of the Top 20 shows listed on the newest national Nielsens, a total of nine are comedies, in contrast to three westerns, two private-eye shows and three variety stanzas. The favorites are Hazel (NBC); Red Skelton (CBS);

Maitre D'oubles Into Nitery Act

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Freddie's here, the Twin Cities' top supper club and the only one playing name acts regularly, is congratulating itself and considering itself fortunate because it has Nate Streitman as its maitre d'. Not only does he greet guests and conduct them to their tables with the utmost graciousness, but he also can fill in as a floorshow performer if an emergency arises.

After an eleventh hour telegraphic cancellation by Buddy Rich, scheduled to open with his combo the night following Christmas (26), Pete Karalis, Freddie's owner, found himself in a jam — sans an act and only a few hours before his first show was due to start. In the short time left he just couldn't round up a replacement for Rich.

Karalis remembered his maitre d' was a onetime performer. He had Streitman do an act, comprising singing and a little laugh-inducing talk on the side. Interrupting his maitre d' tasks just long enough to perform in place of Rich at both the dinner and supper shows, Streitman went over so well that the same procedure was followed Wednesday night.

By Thursday night Karalis was able to land femme hypnotist Pat

Tent's Lack of Musicals Will Spur Need for Names, Agencies Stress

The talent agencies anticipate a huge upswing in the use of names in summer music tents. Top variety acts will be used to a greater degree in most of the large canvas operations around the country, it's believed. For that reason the percenteries are now submitting their talent so bookings can be made before legit musicals block out possibilities.

The feeling in the talent offices is that not enough suitable musical properties will be available for the tent repertoire. Consequently, the canvastops will be needing top acts to replace vehicles which have long since lost their box-office potency.

It's recalled that last summer Harry Belafonte grossed $95,308 at the Oakdale musical Theatre, Wallingford, Conn., topping Danny Kaye's $76,338 at the same spot. However, Belafonte worked at a $7.50 top while Kaye's ceiling was $6.50.

Nat King Cole has already been signed for Warwick, R.I., Laurel, Md., Wallingford and Framingham tents, and other names are being selected from lists now being submitted by the agencies. Other names are also asking the offices to submit them for summer work on the premise that the pay is good, prestige is great and the hours are easier than niteries.

The increased use of variety talent doesn't in any way mean a

American Negro Diva's 'Delilah,' a Swiss Click

Basle, Jan. 2.

Preem of a new production of "Samson and Delilah" at the Stadttheatr here starring Grace Bumbry, American Negro girl as Delilah, brought out a full segment of German, French and Swiss music buffs and critics, mostly enthusiastic, though with a big argument over the fact that it was sung in German. Theatre director Zogg insists Swiss won't attend opera in French, even though (as in this case) it was written originally in French.

Diva ducked the argument by pointing out that she can sing the role in either language and it's up to whoever pays the tab to decide.

'Photocopying' Of Books Decried By Authors League

Authors League of America is expressing considerable anxiety over a recent rule of the American Library Assn. giving sanction and impetus to "photocopying" of books. This is a sneak-in-the-back-door threat to the ownership of the copyright vested in either the author or the publisher. Irvin Karp of counsel for the League points out that the practice of making "photocopy" reproduction, from a single to unlimited number are regularly made without asking or securing consent.

Declares Karp:

"Such unauthorized copying of a copyrighted work, or any substantial portion of it, is clearly an infringement of the author's copyright—which gives him the exclusive right to print, reprint, copy and sell his work. It is infringement whether one copy or a number of copies are made or sold; it is infringement whether the copying is done on a printing press or by

JULIETTE GRECO ON HER FILM CAREER

To Assure Clarity For Japanese, Kramer OKs 'Nuremberg' Dubbing

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

"Judgment at Nuremberg" (UA), slated for spring release, will become first dubbed film in memory here except for some re-releases and pictures geared for kiddie trade.

Producer Stanley Kramer agreed to the innovation proposed by manager Geza Polaty of UA's Japan office after it was explained that dubbing allows a more exact translation than subtitling and that serious war crimes requires complete understanding. Another possible factor is that trial films do traditionally poor here because heavy dialogue demands too much reading from patrons.

Added cost for dubbing on picture is in excess of $10,000. Some subtitled versions will be presented in major cities as specified showings slanted at foreigners and those Japanese who understand English.

Translation for dubbing is being done by leading novelist Hideo Konno while Dr. Ichiro Kiyose, the Speaker of the Lower House of the Diet and the chief counsel at war trials here, is technical advisor.

National and Fan Mags Unpredictable

Press Agents and Stars Nervous as Policies Shift—Puzzle Over Very Soft and Very Rough Pieces

By DORA ALBERT

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Pressagents, film stars and other celebrities are having a difficult time getting the images of current magazines straight. This is understandable, because mags dealing entirely or even partly with show business have kept changing their slant on celebrities.

Last year, Joan Crawford was unhappy about an article by Richard Gehman in McCall's. Later, when approached by Simon and Schuster with an offer of plenty of moola if she'd collaborate with Gehman on her autobiography, she turned it down, accepted instead an offer from Doubleday—reportedly for less money—to collaborate with Jane Ardmore. Articles in McCall's on such stars as Zsa Zsa Gabor and Marilyn Monroe have been extremely frank. But current McCall's carries an almost self-satirizing rave by Eddie Fisher on how wonderful Liz Taylor is!

Look Magazine, too, has varied its pattern so much that no star or pressagent is ever sure ahead of time just how a story will turn out.

One pressagent persuaded one of his biggest clients to give a series of interviews to Look. He expected a laudatory series of

Spinster Sues Mpls. Terp School, Claims It Failed To Find Her a Spouse

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Disgruntled pupils' damage suits against dance studios continue here. The first in 1961 had local Fred Astaire spot defendant in such an action. Just before the year's end it was Dale's.

Seeking $3,500 damages, 62-year old Eunice G. Bennett alleges for that amount the Dale Studio promised but failed to make her popular and so attractive that she'd find a husband. She charges that during a six-week period she was induced to sign contracts totaling $5,900.

For that sum, her complaint avers, the studio's agents told her that dance parties and other activities "would make her popular with members of the opposite sex" and "would enable her to be so attractive that she would become married."

In her complaint she charges that she paid $3,500 on this contract and some dance lessons were given, but the studio agents' promises anent attractiveness and a husband never materialized. The so-called "parties" were attended primarily by other women, it's asserted.

The studio hasn't answered the suit as yet.

Bairds Go 'Cultural'

Washington, Jan. 2.

The Baird Marionettes have embarked on a three and a half month tour of India, Nepal and Afghanistan under auspices of the U.S. Cultural Presentation Program, the State Dept. disclosed over the weekend.

The troupe is comprised of Bill and Cora Baird, five actor-musicians, a stage manager and an electrical-sound technician. Program will include an American folk tale fantasy, "Davy Jones' Locker," and some vaude routines.

Harrah's, Tahoe, Date In June Marks Welk's 1st Nitery Stint in 13 Years

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Lawrence Welk band and troupe of entertainers have been set for their first stand in a Nevada gambling spa—three weeks at Harrah's, Tahoe, starting June 17.

Though neither Sam J. Lutz, Welk's manager, nor Milt Deutsch of the agency bearing his name, who books Harrah's, would reveal figure, deal is understood top coin in history of spot. Cliff Aronson, Deutsch aide, lined up Welk for the date.

It is the first nitery stand for Welk in 13 years and unit he will take to Tahoe will include all the regulars on his ABC-TV series, led by the Lennon Sisters. During stand, tape reruns of tv show will be aired by web. A substitute band also will be lined up to spell Welk on weekends at the Paladium here.

Sophia Loren's Vexation, And Possible Reasons

It may shed some further light on Sophia Loren's anger—and consequent court action—over her "El Cid" billing on a Broadway electric billboard (she objects to her name being under costar Charlton Heston's) to note some of the fine print in the distrib's advertising.

At least in the fullpage blurbs, Allied Artists not only makes mention of Heston as an Academy Award winner, but also designates the pic—Metro's "Ben-Hur." In contrast, under Miss Loren's name, it's noted that she copped the Cannes Film Fest "best actress" laurel, but readers are left to figure it out from there. (It was for the Italo "Two Women.")

A possible connection suggested by the "Ben-Hur" plug is that Metro is also distributing producer Sam Bronston's "King of Kings."

PHIL GREENWALD

Enterprising Director of Entertainment at the huge Concord Hotel, New York says:

"PAUL ANKA the Essence of Entertainment, poised, exceedingly talented and skilled is the most personable of artists.

"However, most gratifying, just recently, PAUL ANKA has exceeded himself in breaking the All Time Holiday Attendance Record for the third time."

54% of Visitors To Japan Yanks

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

Some 212,300 foreigners visited Japan during 1961 and spent $116,000,000, according to info disclosed by the Tourist Industry Bureau of the Transportation Ministry. The number of visitors is a 30% increase over the previous year.

Of the total number, 97,700 were classified as tourists, 61,600 as traders and the balance in other transit categories. Americans, who accounted for 23% of the visitors in prewar days, represented 54% of total in 1961.

In 1964, when the Olympics will be staged in Tokyo, 550,000 foreigners are expected to visit Japan. By 1975, visitors are estimated to increase 5.9 times the 1960 figure, totalling over 1,250,000. Spendings by that year are projected at $610,000,000.

PERLE MESTA'S BACK, AND METRO'S GOT HER

Washington, Jan. 2.

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer has nabbed the American Newspaper Women's Club and Perle Mesta to sponsor the American premiere of "Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" here Feb. 8. Film opens at the 3,420-seater Loew's Capitol.

Usual array of capital luminaries, including the diplomatic roster, Capitol Hill and Cabinet, are on the invite list. Mrs. Mesta, who has not been so active in Washington society during the JFK regime (she backed Nixon), will serve as general chairman for the event. The Newspaper Women's Club is one of two rival femme press outfits here, the other being the Women's National Press Club.

Toots Shor's Reopens With Mob Scene

By ABEL GREEN

Toots Shor the past week grabbed more space than Brigitte Bardot and Tshombe combined with the al fresco premiere of his new booze parlor in New York, which is notable as a street address in that he completed full circle from the Prohibition era when he was bouncer and quondam night manager at Leon & Eddie's, a favorite filling station, at that address. Now it is an eight-story structure, with the Myers Bros. garage occupying everything but the nearer-to-5th Ave. basement-streetfloor-second floor devoted to the erumbum's new oasis. The address is the same 33W52.

Outpouring of journalistic loyalty was extraordinary in a community where free space to saloons, bistros, pubs, taverns and the like is typically confined either to the chatter columns or, becomes news on extraordinary occasions, when some socialite or charity event takes place. The lavish columnar space, furthermore, while vicariously a terrific cuffo commercial for the rotund boniface of Chez Shor also recognized two fundamentals: (1) that his restaurant is a landmark on the Gotham scene; (2), that he, the personality, was part of the said Manhattan pattern of life and the pursuit of good groceries and reasonable hangovers.

Shor is unique also in that (a) he never had or has a pressagent and (b) he sneaked the preem. Only friends, and via grapevine, knew that last Wednesday (27), at 3 p.m., the doors were open and the kingsize areas around the two huge bars, on the main floor and in the downstairs grillroom, soon assumed Grand Central Station rush-hour proportions. As the outpourings of that special breed of Gotham "waif"—many of them top byliners, sports figures, show people, et al.—snowballed into a pyramiding swell of printer's ink

Latest D.C. Tangent On Soldiers in Zanuck Pic: They Didn't 'Volunteer'

Washington, Jan. 2.

The verbal battle over Darryl F. Zanuck's "Longest Day" World War II saga for 20th-Fox is proving one of longest disputes here once again. the hassle threatens to jeopardize the whole practice of military cooperation with Hollywood.

The Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee dug up the issue anew. Bogey is raised that use of soldiers as pic extras smacks of "involuntary servitude"—the legal euphemism for slavery. Subcommittee Chairman Sam Ervin (D.-N. C.), ex-jurist and a leading constitutional light of the upper chamber, dispatched a letter to Defense Secretary McNamara demanding a probe of complaints he said he's received from GI's allegedly "pressured" into playing extra roles for the Zanuck production in France.

Hearings are slated by Ervin's group late this month. The general topic will be constitutional

Van Johnson Injured In London 'Music Man' Role

London, Jan. 2.

Van Johnson, playing the lead in the London edition of "The Music Man," collapsed on stage last night (Mon.) when the tip of one of his fingers was cut off in an accident onstage. The filmster turned musical actor was making an entrance from a set depicting a train when a door swung back on his hand.

A tourniquet was applied to the finger in Johnson's dressing room and he was taken to a hospital by taxi. He was said to be resting comfortably.

An understudy, Gordon Boyd, took over Johnson's role after a slight delay.

Headmaster Deletes Boy Critic's 'Dolce' Review; Young Editors Resign

Boston, Jan. 2.

A student review of "La Dolce Vita" (Astor) in the Boston Latin School's Register brought about the impounding of some 2,400 copies by the headmaster, who said he felt a review of the film was "not a fit subject for a high school publication."

Headmaster John J. Doyle said the magazine will be released to the students after the Xmas holidays with the film review deleted. Two student editors of the school's magazine resigned from the staff after the headmaster's impounding.

"We are being restricted even further than the natural limits of decency would restrict any publication," said Daniel Barnett, 17, and Guinar Viksnins, 18. The student editors said 12 other members of the editorial staff also will resign.

Headmaster Doyle said that the film received an "adult only, special classification" from the Legion of Decency, and he felt it was not "a fit subject." Supt. Frederick J. Gillis, head of Boston school department, backed the headmaster for his "prompt action in suppressing a review of an exotic film." The film had a long run in the Gary and Capri Theatres and is now in subruns.

100-THEATRE CINERAMA GOAL

Board, Production and Mgmt. Role For Youngstein With Cinerama

Appointment of Max E. Youngstein as exec v.p. of Cinerama Inc. and president of Cinerama's newly-acquired Cinemiracle International subsidiary goes hand in hand with new Cinerama ambitions. This outfit, headed by Nicholas Reisini, which acquired the Stanley Warner interests in the Cinerama assets, is geared for more expansion in the fields of theatrical production, exhibition and, as a new facet in the operation, the manufacture and marketing of a still camera for the amateur market.

The official naming of Youngstein to the Cinerama post was made Thursday (28) by Reisini who hosted a press conference along with Youngstein. Actually it was almost ancient history, since the new alignment had been widely published previously.

The setup is this: Youngstein, as of Dec. 31, is entirely untied of United Artists, where he had been a co-owner and v.p. since the Arthur B. Krim-Robert S. Benjamin regime took over in 1950. He helmed advertising, publicity and exploitation as well as taking a role in administration at UA. On Jan. 2 he joined Cinerama, with an office in Manhattan, and functioning as exec v.p. over the entire Cinerama scheme of things.

Youngstein declined to discuss details of his employment contract, but reportedly it's for five years. No details as to terms, stock options, etc.

Outspoken ex-lawyer Youngstein, now 48, never was candid as to the reasons for the UA departure, nor were Krim or Benjamin, but it was clear a year and a half ago that Youngstein was available for another affiliation.

He joined Cinerama, he said, because this company, unique among picture outfits, "has little or no concentration on the past; all the concentration is on today and tomorrow." In contrast, he said, "many people in the industry are reduced to a state of inertia and, if not inertia, then repeating themselves, doing the same things they did 25 to 50 years ago."

Commented Reisini: "We (meaning himself and Youngstein) think alike. It is an intellectual as well as a physical marriage and will result in harmonious work."

As for the expansion, Reisini said the company has a camera capable of shooting space films and the United States Government has ordered the first space film for showing at the Seattle Fair next year. This is 90% finished. Two features are near completion in coproduction with Metro and there are two more to go, these to be followed by others but with no con-

Chi Firm to Shoot Commie History

Chicago, Jan. 2.

A Chicago film company expects to have completed in March a feature length "drama-mentary" on the history of Communism. The new coinage describes a method of presenting documentary footage in the context of a dramatic situation.

Pic is being underwritten by Mid-American Motion Picture Corp., a new firm headed by Reginald J. Holzer (and not to be confused with another Chi-based film outfit, Mid-Continent, whose prexy is Herschell Lewis), and will be produced by Fred A. Niles who heads his own production shop here. Niles estimates that the film will be brought in for under $250,000, proving again, he says, that pictures can be done more economically in Chicago than on the Coast.

The fictional element will be directed by a legit stager as yet unnamed, and the two principal roles in the drama will be played

'Life of Buddha' Gives Japanese Yen for Big Pix

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

Huge success of Daiei's "Sakya" (Life of Buddha), Japan's first 70m picture and most costly film at stated $1,500,000 is expected to be felt throughout Nipponese industry in fewer and bigger pictures this year. Total production may drop as much as 120 from present assembly line of about 600 features annually.

Daiei already has two more 70m entries on the boards. One will be "Shin-no-Shikotei" (Emperor Shi of Ancient China), which is expected to launch locationing on Taiwan in spring for late October release.

EZ BAKER, BOB FLOOD UNITE AS PRODUCERS

A new indie producing company, Baker-Flood Productions, has been formed in New York by producer-actor Ezra R. Baker and writer Robert J. Flood. Duo is now making plans to film "The Monument," a suspense story set in present-day Berlin, written by Flood.

Baker, who has just resigned as eastern head of Paramount's tv commercial subsidiary, was earlier partnered with Bob Davis and Duard Slattery in Little Movies, indie outfit which won an Academy Award last year with its short, "Day of The Painter." In addition to producing "Painter," Baker also acted in the short, later repeating the double function in Little Movies' first feature, "Come Thursday," which has not yet been sold for release.

Cafes and Hotels First, Is Interstate Credo

Dallas, Jan. 2.

Students from Southern Methodist U. and Bishop College have met with John Adams, executive veepee of the Interstate Theatres, to continue discussion on integration of local theatres for college students.

Otic Corcine, students at Bishop College said, "At this meeting, as at the last, Adams said he would not be able to integrate his theatres until Dallas restaurants and hotels did."

M.K. Curry Jr. prez of Bishop College, said both student groups were "working independently from the Bishop College or Southern Methodist U. student bodies."

Two SMU students, members of the group, John Reinhart and Tom Beauchamp, were not available for comment on the meeting, having left immediately for Austin to attend the U. of Texas Human Relations Conference.

NEXT JULY 4 KEYS COMPLETION PACT

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Under the terms of Cinerama's pact with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer on its partnership in four features —including "How the West Was Won" and "Brothers Grimm"—currently in production—Cinerama is not required to have maximum of 100 world theatre representation until 18 months after the first of the two pix named are in distribution. July 4, 1962, preem date for "How," is key to time limit.

Arrangement affords Cinerama opportunity to hew to terms set forth in deals for new Super Cineramas in all parts of the world. This type of theatre is basic format prexy Nicholas Reisini is after for $12,000,000 "How" and $6,000,000 "Brothers." He's even set terms on motif. Entire house, seats, walls, ceiling and what have you must be one color—a soft tone, attractive, conducive to patrons' overall enjoyment of entire operation on screen and elsewhere.

Exhibitors throughout the country will have first crack at building and operating new Super Cineramas. They are definitely being given preference over Joe Wolf Realty Co. which recently signed a deal with Cinerama to build 15 such units in the U.S.

Three pacts have already been made by Cinerama prexy Nicholas Reisini. Another is brewing in the Hollywood area. Latter situation has two important indie circuits bidding for the project which must be ready by July 4. They are National Theatres & Television, which operates some 240 units nationally, and the Cooper Foundation with 22 theatres in its string in northwest.

Local Cinerama will have 1,250 seating capacity. Cooper Foundation is reported to have the edge over NT&T with an option on a parcel at Hollywood & Vine. Carl Laemmle Jr. is believed to own the property involved.

Wolf Realty also is understood to have an option on a parcel on Hollywood Blvd. He is said to be ready to build provided NT&T and Cooper cannot guarantee completion of the house by Independence Day for the preem of "How the West Was Won." $12,000,000 joint production by Cinerama and MGM. If necessary, three shifts working around the clock, may be put to the test, if Reisini's demands are met. And with double or triple crews, if necessary. But July 4 deadline is the key to who gets the Hollywood pact in the three-way nip and tuck.

Cooper Foundation, it will be recalled, preemed the first Super Cinerama in Denver last March 8. As a result of its successful operation, it will build a second house in Minneapolis. This deal is set. Work should get under way as soon as weather permits.

Three other projects set are as follows:

In Houston, Crescent Amusement Co., with 83 houses in the south, is planning a June preem for 1,000 seater to meet Cinerama demands.

In San Diego, Calif., Boston Circuit of Lockwood & Gordon with 23 houses, also will have a June opening for its 1,000 seater.

In New Orleans, E. D. Martin circuit with 187 southern houses, is planning on a July 4 debut for new 1,000-seat Super Cinerama.

Each of the three projects will cost $1,000,000, according to Reisini. The Hollywood house should approximate $2,000,000.

Cooper, in addition to Minneapolis, is negotiating to build its third Cinerama unit in San Francisco. This will be decided shortly.

In New York, new Cinerama Super will figure in the Times Square area. Negotiations have been under way and are near closing at this point. Wolf will probably build this one. Gotham and Hollywood are regarded as two uppermost projects on Cinerama's agenda to tee off "How."

Reisini pointed out his company will not consider any theatre

DIVIDENDS' SLOWER PACE, '61 VERSUS '60

Washington, Jan. 2.

Dividends of motion picture companies lagged slightly behind the 1960 pace during the first 11 months of 1961, according to the Federal Commerce Dept.

Through November, picture company stockholders received a $21,649,000 melon as against $22,049,000 for the same 1960 span. Dept. pegged the November total at $1,539,000 compared with $1,704,000 for November, 1960.

Film dividends, by falling behind 1960 figures, departed from the national trend for dividend-paying corporations. Publicly reported cash divident payments through last November added up to $11,400,000,000—a 2.5% gain over 1960.

WGA Unfairs' Brusseau

Writers Guild of America has placed Westminster Films (N.Y.) and Willian E. Brusseau on its "unfair" list, for their alleged failure to pay $3,750 due a writer for a screenplay.

Members may not work for them unless they first post a bond with WGA guaranteeing the full amount of the writers' proposed compensation.

If and when Paramount unloads (reportedly via MCA) the bulk of its post-48s to television, that would leave only Universal, among majors, as a post-48 holdout—though not necessarily in the hold-the-line spirit that exhibition has been urging. Rather, and contrarily, it has been fiscal and marketing considerations that have prompted U to keep the post-48 vaulties under lock.

Universal, as prexy Milt Rackmil has apprised the shareholders, has no cause to be stampeded to the video syndication marts. The corporate health holds well, partly because of the amortized revenues from U's pre-48s, which have been getting "late show" circuit exposure the past four years.

This is under a deal set in late '57 with Screen Gems, as video distrib, stipulating a $20,000,000 guarantee to the producer. (To recap, it gave Universal $2,000,000 the first year, $3,000,000 each annum thereafter over a seven-year span, after which the tv rentals split 60-40 for U.)

As for the post-48s, the assumption is that eventual disposition will pivot on how the current discussions go projecting Universal as distributor of MCA theatrical films. If deal jells, MCA-TV would almost certainly take on the U vaulties.

Universal's withheld oldies, though weighted with theatrical programmers, include a number of attractive titles and performers. In the batch are some early Rock Hudson and Tony Curtis efforts, and four or five Jimmy Stewart starrers. Among the titles that presumably would be made available for homescreen playoff are "Magnificent Obsession" (with Rock Hudson, and first of the solid Ross Hunter moneymakers at the studio, circa '54), "Glenn Miller Story," "Harvey," some Abbott and Costello comedies, and a number of the "Francis" (talking mule) and Ma-Pa Kettle rustics. Several horror and sci-fi items would also come out of the vault.

Zito, 32, Jugged For Smell-Bomb

Kansas City, Jan. 2.

Sentence of a year in jail was passed on a man who was found guilty of setting off a stench bomb in the Roxy Theatre Dec. 8. Phillip Zito, 32, denied he set off the bomb and appealed the decision given in magistrate court of Louis J. Mazuch, Dec. 26.

The court found the man guilty after hearing testimony of two witnesses, who said they saw Zito in the theatre from where the stench came and found a paper towel and bits of broken glass on the floor at the seat where he had been.

Since that time the theatre has experienced two other stench bombings, the latest outbreak of violence against the Durwood circuit which operates the Roxy, Capri and Empire as downtown first-runs.

Earlier various damages have been suffered by the Durwood properties, including the destruction of a screen at the Capri and the breaking of windows and signs in the Empire building. A dispute exists currently between the theatre circuit and the operators and stage hands of the IATSE.

Technicolor, Brooklyn, Becomes Mayflower

Technicolor's studio in Brooklyn has been sold to Benjamin Gertner, prexy of Biograph Studios, and lot will be reopened under name of Mayflower Studios after extensive renovations, per Patrick J. Frawley Jr., Tech board chairman and chief exec officer.

Studio will be made available to both feature and tv producers.

Omens Multiply of Foreign & American Element Enmeshed In Global Film Biz

By VINCENT CANBY

Evidence testifying to the extent to which foreign-language features and American product made abroad have penetrated the U. S. market (and consciousness) warrants two conclusions at start of 1962: foreign pix, dubbed or titled, with or without Production Code seals or Legion of Decency okays, are already a major source for U. S. exhib income, and (2) any legislative attempt to prevent Hollywood producers from making films abroad would presumably be disastrous for the entire U. S. film industry.

Significant, because of the upcoming Academy Awards balloting, was the announcement last week that for the first time in its 27 years, the New York Film Critics Circle voted an award to a performance in a foreign language film—Sophia Loren in the Italo "Two Women." The N. Y. critics' choices often have been a forecast as to how the Oscar votes will go. Miss Loren thus seems to be a cinch for a nomination at least.

Also likely for Oscar nomination in a number of categories is another Italo entry, "La Dolce Vita," which already has racked up a domestic U. S. rental of close to $3,000,000 (in nothing but subtitled version yet!) That's almost as good as Brigitte Bardot did in "And God Created Women," which played the majority of its dates with the star speaking (a dubbed) English. And "Vita" is still going strong.

Ironically, "Vita" will probably get its Oscar nominations only in those categories where it will be competing with domestic and English language films, since it seems highly unlikely that the Italian government will see fit to nominate the film as the Italo entry for the Academy's foreign language Oscar.

Further evidence of foreign inroads: a check of the 18 different attractions playing Christmas-New Year's dates at firstruns on Broadway, and in the arties, shows only four pix which can be classified as "completely made in Hollywood"—20th-Fox's "Second Time Around" (Paramount Theatre), Paramount's "Summer and Smoke" (DeMille and Sutton), Buena Vista's "Babes in Toyland" (Music Hall), and United Artists' "Pocketful of Miracles" (Victoria, Trans-Lux 52d St.).

Two more of the 18 were filmed only partially in Hollywood—UA's "West Side Story" (Rivoli) had extensive locations in New York, and same company's "Judgment at Nuremberg" (Palace) had German locations. UA's "Something Wild" (Plaza) was filmed entirely in New York, which some dyed-in-the-wool Hollywoodites might well condemn as "runaway," even though it didn't quite make it beyond Ambrose Lightship.

The other N. Y. firstruns showcased 11 pix made entirely outside this country: UA's "One, Two, Three" (Astor, Fine Arts), in Germany (with one scene in Hollywood); Embassy's "Wonders of Aladdin" (Forum, Baronet), Italy and North Africa; Warner Bros.' "The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone" (Capitol, Trans-Lux 85th St.), Britain and Italy; 20th-Fox's "The Innocents"), Britain; Showcorporation's "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Guild), Czechoslovakia; Astor's "Les Liaisons Dangereuse" (Henry Miller), France; Embassy's "No Love for Johnny" (Little Carnegie), Britain; Kingsley's "The Five-Day Lover" (Normandie), France; Columbia's "Loss of Innocence" (68th St. Playhouse), Britain, France; Metro's "King of Kings" (State), Spain; Allied Artists' "El Cid" (Warner), Spain.

Clearly it would have been a lean holiday period at these firstruns had any kind of "Buy American Only" plan been in effect.

NOT QUITE A CHAPEL

Detroit, Jan. 2.

United Detroit Theatres converted its downtown 1,408-seat Madison into a temporary rest-haven during the holiday season. Footweary shoppers are being invited to come in free between 11 a.m. and 9 p.m. The shoppers sit with a sigh and watch trailers of such attractions, some current at UD theatres, as "Flower Drum Song," "Babes in Toyland," "Pocketful of Miracles," "Bachelor Flat," and "The Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone."

Berlin Fest: June 22

Berlin, Jan. 2.

Twelfth annual Berlin Film Festival will be held from June 22 to July 3, again under official sponsorship of the Berlin Senate and Government of Federal Republic of Germany. Alfred Bauer is director general.

Bert Reisfeld, Hollywood correspondent for German publications and radio, has been appointed for sixth consecutive year to organize U.S. participation in fest in cooperation with the Motion Picture Export Assn.

Spreading the Message Re Torre-Nilsson, So Far Known Only to Buffs

Argentine film director Leopoldo Torre-Nilsson, highly regarded by film buffs in this country though as yet little known outside that group, may be the only film director in the world at present for whom a special distribution company has been formed just to handle the release of his pix in the U.S.

Making up the new company, Angel Productions, are the artie theatre circuit, Ackerman & Furman, exhib David Sanders, indie distrib Sandy Weiner and Orestes Trucco, head of Argentine Film Enterprises, which is spearheading a drive to sell Argentine product to the Spanish lingual houses in the States. Ackerman & Furman control nine theatres in the east and Sanders 11, though the Torre-Nilsson films will not necessarily be booked into theatres controlled by the partners in Angel.

Only one of the Argentine director's pix has yet received commercial release in the U.S. That was "Casa del Angel," released two years ago by Kingsley International as "End of Innocence." Angel Productions has tentative plans to put three of the director's films into release by the end of this summer. First will be "Summer Skin," an entry at the 1961 Venice fest, to go out next month, to be followed by "Hand in The Trap," a Critics' Prize winner at the 1961 Cannes fest, and finally, "End of The Party." All go in titled versions only. If the pix are to be dubbed, Torre-Nilsson is expected to direct the jobs himself.

Unique Distrib Pattern, On Czech 'Midsummer' Opens Marketing Wedge

Showcorporation's unique prerelease distrib pattern on "Midsummer Night's Dream," Czech-made puppet film that features the voices of Richard Burton and members of the Old Vic speaking Shakespeare's lines, has provided some pertinent data on the marketing of "special interest" pix, according to its president, Bob Mamby, and veep, Fred Schneier.

Pic preemed at the Guild Theatre, artie in the Radio City complex, the week before Christmas on a grind policy, and the following day, Dec. 19, started a series of once-a-day showings in 14 other arties in Manhattan, Westchester, Long Island, Connecticut and New Jersey. In these latter houses, pic was screened in morning or early afternoon hours before the houses ordinarily opened for their regular showings. The special prerelease runs ended yesterday (Tues.) at the Guild, as well as the other arties, and it's intended that the film will come back to a number of the outlying houses for extended grind runs beginning in February.

Purpose of the pattern was to get a cut of the always-hefty Christmas-New Year's business, as well as to provide advance word-of-mouth on the attraction which Mamby and Schneier feel will have an almost endless theatrical life. They also point out that the morning-early afternoon screenings were providing extra revenue for exhibs whose houses would otherwise have been dark at that time.

In a candid breakdown on the financial results of the experiment, Schneier reports that business during the pre-Christmas week was poor at almost all the houses, but that post-Christmas it was good-to-excellent at seven of the 14 outlying theatres. At the seven outlying houses where business was good, exec says that the once-a-day screenings will bring in an average of between $1,700 and $2,000 at each house for the Christmas week. At each of the "good" houses, he further reported, the take on "Midsummer" each day represented about half of the house's total take for that day, despite the fact "Midsummer" was shown only once and the regular

Panorama of Hollyburn, Canada; Line Up Six for Shooting in 1962

By ALBERT SCHARPER

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Panorama Films Ltd., Canadian company now building a studio in Vancouver to be called Hollyburn, has slated six features for lensing in 1962. First deal set is with James Clavell, who last year produced "Walk Like A Dragon" at Paramount and prior to that wrote and directed at 20th-Fox. His credits include "The Fly" and "Five Gates To Hell" at 20th.

Clavell will write, direct and produce "Circle of Greed," for April teeoff in Canada, and "The Bitter And The Sweet" for June start.

William J. Maginetti, Hollywood production exec who worked at various studios, some weeks ago joined the Canadian firm as production veep. He is setting deals with Hollywood talent.

All pix to be made by Panorama will be Eady Plan, of course, but IATSE labor will be used. IA coast exec Zeal Fairbanks in the autumn inked Panorama to a pact—not difficult in that IA has jurisdiction over filmaking crafts in Canada; indeed, for some years has had three locals in Vancouver.

Lord Folkestone of London has a big stake in Panorama, owning land on which studio is rising; also much land on which pix will locale. Rest of financing of Panorama is strictly Canadian.

According to Maginetti and Clavell, as much American-citizen talent as possible will be used, as long as Eady Plan standards are met. The Eady yardstick is that 75% of salaries on any pic must go to British nationals, which embraces Canadians, too, of course. Limit is two stars, and/or director, producer.

Clavell, English-born, believes most of casting can be done in Hollywood, using British nationals, but as many American craftsmen as possible.

Panorama, from its slate of six features, plans to carve out two vidpix pilots as the new tv quota in Canada stipulates 55% of programming telecast there must be British Empire product.

Clavell, who will work on percentage, plus fee, already has been paid in part. He's acquired a mountain far north in Canada—which belonged to Lord Folkestone, of course.

LONG BEACH CHANGES

Laurel, Lido To Interboro Via Berk & Krumgold

Interboro theatre circuit, New York, has added to its nabe holdings with acquisition of two situations in Long Beach, L.I., the 1,600-seat Laurel and 600-seat Lido.

Former was sold by the Laurel Theatre Corp., latter by Briart Operating Corp., with Berk & Krumgold, Manhattan broker, handling both deals.

N.Y. Film Critics 1961 'Bests'

These are the winners in the 27th annual vote of the New York Film Critics, the awards to be presented Jan. 20 at a reception at Sardi's.

Best Picture of 1961—"West Side Story" (UA)
Best Director—Robert Rossen for "The Hustler" (20th)
Best Actor—Maximillian Schell in "Judgment at Nuremberg" (UA)
Best Actress—Sophia Loren in "Two Women" (Embassy)
Best Foreign Film—"La Dolce Vita" (Astor)
Best screenplay—Abby Mann for "Judgment" (UA)

It was initial selection by group of a musical film for tops and precedental pick of a foreign language actress, Miss Loren, as "best".

"West Side" won on third ballot, 11-to-five over "Nuremberg." Other pix which received one or more votes in the course of the balloting were Columbia's "Loss of Innocence," "Guns of Navarone" and "Raisin in The Sun," and Continental Distributing's "Saturday Night and Sunday Morning" and "The Mark."

Rossen won the best director nod on the sixth ballot, 10 to six over the Robert Wise-Jerome Robbins tandem on "West Side." On the first ballot, Stanley Kramer received three votes for "Judgment." Others who figured in course of the balloting included Carl Foreman for "Navarone" (though J. Lee Thompson and not Foreman is credited with "Navarone"), Guy Green ("The Mark"), Billy Wilder ("One, Two, Three"), John Ford ("Two Rode Together") and Karel Reisz ("Saturday Night").

Chief competitor to Schell was James Cagney ("One, Two, Three") and chief competitor to Miss Loren was Geraldine Page (Paramount's "Summer and Smoke"). Abby Mann's writing award went to him on the sixth ballot in an eight to seven vote over "One, Two, Three" (Billy Wilder and I. A. L. Diamond).

Reynolds: Hollywood Unions Invite Injury to Themselves If Attempting 'Runaway' Boycott

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Hollywood unions face retaliation "within 24 hours" if they boycott features lensed abroad on grounds they are "runaway" production. That's the allegation of producer Sheldon Reynolds, who said any such Hollywood move would bring about serious "political, ideological and emotional" consequences.

Reynolds, an American theatrical and tv film producer who spent most of the past 11 years producing in Europe, has been here producing a pilot of a private eye comedy, "Patrick Stone," a coproduction with Four Star. He made his remarks anent the European reaction to Hollywood union's lament just before returning to the continent.

The producer said that he did not want to sound a note of "sensationalism," but, he added, "I want to remind American unions that when they threaten such a boycott, it's a boycott of union-made product. The unions in Europe feel very strongly about it.

"There are countries in which American product has around 50% of their playing time, and if in addition to that, American unions will advocate a boycott of what to them is a minor compensation as far as they are concerned—by virtue of an occasional picture shot in their country—then they will react not better, not worse, but exactly the same as U. S. unions would react if American product were boycotted .... British unions are much tougher than American unions, and they find this (Hollywood attitude) hard to believe," he said.

Reynolds asserted retaliation first by U. S. unions, then by European, would hurt everybody, averring "the European would, in a way, love to see a (mutual) boycott. Then they would get their playing time back, and can you imagine what it would do to their production? You can't go into a country, take millions of dollars a year out of it, and not give something back. Unions in Europe have a strong voice in government affairs and political repercussions would really be something."

Studios, Labor Council Will Palaver 'Runaway' Issues at Roundtable

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

There will be a meeting in this community prior to Jan. 10 (reopening of Congress in Washington) between studio managements and the craft unions represented by the AFL-CIO Labor Council. Object is to have a first exchange of views on the tangled issues of U.S. productions made in foreign countries rather than in Hollywood.

Decision to meet follows a suggestion of the council, IATSE International rep George Flaherty and Charles S. Vaughan, veep of Assn. of Motion Picture Producers, will be joint chairmen.

TEENAGE REVIEWERS HAVE O'SEAS GUESTS

Dallas, Jan. 2.

Dallas Teenage Motion Picture Review Board guested several foreign exchange students at a recent local screening, via Mrs. Roderic B. Thomas, chairman of the Texas Motion Picture Board of Review.

Guest observers at the regular monthly screening were Lena Mavroukaky, an exchange student from Greece; Vre Haefliger, Switzerland; Rosalie Terheyden, The Netherlands; Alfredo Pachel, Ecuador; Claes Lauritzen, Sweden and Mariko Okutsu, Japan.

COURT OF FILM DISPUTES

Media Guaranty, Helpful to Film Biz In Past, Looks Moribund; Murrow And Rooney United Against It

By JAY LEWIS

Washington, Jan. 2.

The Informational Media Guaranty Program, designed to enable film distributors, book, mag and newspaper publishers to overcome currency barriers abroad, appears to have a dim future. Ii fact, the word is it might not have any future at all if a formidable body of opinion in U. S. Information Agency and State Dept. is able to prevail.

New rules written since Edward R. Murrow became USIA Director place an affirmative burden on the distributor to prove the film he wants to submit under the IMG program will advance U. S. interests in the country involved. Previously, pictures were okayed as long as they didn't obviously detract from Uncle Sam's image, thus at least theoretically letting innocuous, neutral fare take advantage of the program.

The new rules have been applied stringently and since last October, when they went into effect, reportedly only about ten of some 140 features submitted have been allowed. This is a drastic reversal of past policy. In recent years, generally about two-thirds of films submitted have made the grade. Books and magazines also have been hard-hit by the new USIA policy.

Slow Attrition

The program has been whittled down gradually through the years with both the Administration and Congress niggardly about asking for and appropriating money for the IMG fund. The film phase operates only in four countries—Viet Nam, Turkey, Yugoslavia and Poland. The program is not a subsidy, strictly speaking. It guarantees distributors a dollar return on their revenue in the nation where they rent their pic. The U. S. is ordinarily able to use the foreign currencies so obtained.

Opposition to IMG is two-fold—from Congress and within USIA. House Appropriations Committee member John Rooney (D-N. Y.), who heads the subcommittee with authority over IMG moneys, sharpens his axe for use on the program every year. (Motion Picture Assn. prexy Eric Johnston appeared before Rooney several years ago to plead for more funds with the result appearing to be an even greater reduction than anticipated. Perhaps on the theory that Rooney's mind is like a brick wall on the subject, MPAA hasn't been too vocal during the past couple years about IMG.)

There are signs now that opposition to the program may be jelling in USIA to the point where the idea is being tossed around to giving the IMG the complete axe. Hostility has been grounded on the idea that IMG in a sense paves the way for a commercial propaganda force in competition with official USIA channels. There are also those in the agency who don't like some of the publications, including two or three top circulation periodicals, which have used the program.

Film industry circles concerned with the fate of the program are already thinking of ways to retrieve it in event it gets the heave-ho from USIA. One idea is to move the program to the Commerce Dept. The new USIA rules underscore the attitude that Murrow & Co. regard films using IMG as propaganda. Murrow's Hollywood talk last fall, which raked the quality of American feature exports, left little doubt that he feels even films using regular commercial distribution methods abroad with no Government assist are propaganda vehicles for Uncle Sam for better or worse.

KAHN THINKS POSITIVE

Toll Can't Sell Just Anything After That Fight

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

TelePrompter's Irv Kahn opines that if so mediocre a closed-circuit attraction as the recent Patterson-McNeeley heavyweight title bout can yield a profit, however small, it demonstrates that the toll medium "can sell just about anything."

Exec so expressed himself in an interview with Minneapolis Tribune sports staffer Gene Ward. At the time, with receipts still to be totaled, Kahn was confident the largescreen coverage of the fight would leave a profit. There have been no announced figures from TelePrompter since, but it's understood the venture just about broke even.

Denker Loses His Suit Vs. 20th And Oursler Estate

The N. Y. Court of Appeals has ruled against author Henry Denker in his suit against 20th-Fox, and the heirs of Fulton Oursler, in which Denker sought termination of the contract under which "The Greatest Story Ever Told" was sold to 20th.

Denker had brought suit charging that 20th had been required to complete production of the film version of "Story" within five years of the original contract, made in June, 1954. When Oursler's heirs failed to join him in the action, they (Fulton Oursler Jr. and April Oursler Armstrong) were named as defendants along with 20th.

The Court of Appeals has now ruled that since Denker and the Ourslers acted jointly to sell the rights to 20th, "it would require similar joint action to undo what was done and obtain rescission of the contract."

The Court also refused to acknowledge that the heirs had acted in "bad faith" by not joining him in the suit. The Court said that while "fraud or bad faith may well enlarge the right of one of several coparties to a contract to act alone," the refusal to join in this case did not constitute wrongdoing.

INTRA-TRADE FOR FAST DECISIONS

Rome, Jan. 2.

European film distributors have called for the establishment of an international Court of Arbitration as a guarantee to quickly settle disputes between distributors of different countries.

Meeting in Rome at a General Assembly, the International Federation of Film Distributor Associations (FIAD) unanimously "reconfirmed the absolute necessity to establish an International Court of Arbitration to guarantee the rapid resolution of controversies between motion picture organizations in different countries."

The FIAD General Assembly was presided by President Franco Penotti, President of the National Union of Film Distributors of Italy. The assembly took the following action:

It will appeal to Governments of member countries to speed up the granting of film export permits and exchange of films between nations.

It will propose that the International Federation of Film Producers join with FIAD in drawing up an accord governing relations between producers and distributors.

It will initiate a study designed to improve cooperation between distributors of member countries.

Finally, the Assembly unanimously confirmed appointment of the 1962-63 Directive Council, composed of Franco Penotti (Italy) as President; Horst Von Hartlieb (Germany), Joaquin Agusti (Spain), and Robert Chabert (France) as Vice-presidents; Gontrand Schwaller (France as General Secretary; Cianfarani (Italy) as Vice-General Secretary and Sautter (Switzerland) as Treasurer.

Daylight Saving Haunts Virginia

Exhibs in Virginia are girding to defeat efforts to extend daylight saving time in the state. Summer clock advancing has been a perennial hot issue for showmen in various sections, notably Minnesota, where smalltown theatres have been especially exuberant in opposition.

In the Old Dominion, daylight saving has been optional, with only a few communities going for it. (Richmond has been among the areas resisting). But now moves are in the works to make time-tampering official and statewide. Spearheading campaign against adoption of the plan is the Virginia Motion Picture Theatre Assn., a TOA affiliate.

Says Visiting Mar del Plata Rep: Yanks Would Be Smart to Worry About Their Status in Argentina

With European stars such as Marcello Mastroianni, Jeanne Moreau, Alain Delon, Vittorio De Sica and Sophia Loren becoming increasingly potent at the Argentine boxoffice, the American film industry—for strictly selfish economic reasons—would do well to give more thought to protecting their previously solid South American film market, according to Argentine film director, Fernando Ayala.

Speaking frankly in his role as the veep of the annual Mar del Plata film fest, and in New York to set preliminary plans for a U.S. delegation to the 1962 fest, Ayala noted that in the past the U.S. delegation to Mar Plata has usually been a "last-minute" group of film personalities who just happened to be available. Ayala understands the problems in coralling Hollywood directors and stars—the major studios no longer have them at their beck and call for promotional activities, but he suggests that this obstacle might well be overcome, in view of the increasing competition in the Latin film market.

Referring to star Janet Leigh's remarks in the Dec. 13 VARIETY, concerning her tumultuous reception during a USIA tour of Brazil and Argentina, Ayala said it's quite true that the Latins "want to like the norte Americanos," films star or otherwise, and thus the Hollywood industry's promotional problems down south would be comparatively easy to resolve. As yet, he said, European stars haven't gained much of a foothold outside the major cities, whereas American film personalities are known "everywhere."

The Mar Del Plata film fest, set for March 21-31 this year, cannot hope to compete with Cannes or Venice, Ayala agrees, as a film market place for American distribs interested in lookseeing new product. However, it may be of even more vital concern in the larger area of public relations, for the film industry, as well as the U.S. State Department which is out to remake the North American image via President Kennedy's Alliance for Progress.

In contrast with the comparative disinterest on the part of Hollywood in Mar del Plata, Ayala pointed out that the Europeans go at the affair with tremendous promotional drive, backed by government funds, to drive a wedge into the L.A. market. Even now, he said, almost three months before the fest start, the French film reps are scouting the location for their official reception during the fest.

Ayala returns to Argentina shortly after the first of the year, but hopes to be back in February to continue lining up U.S. film guests for the fest. He also is tentatively planning a trip to the coast then to invite personalities.

NT&T '61 Profit Dips to $837,431; Telefilm Drain

Los Angeles, Jan. 2.

National Theatres & Television report earnings of $837,431, or 30c a share, for the fiscal 1961 year. This compares with $888,263 loss for the previous year.

At the same time, the company revealed it has set up a reserve of approximately $7,700,000 on its investment in National Telefilm Associates. With the profit charged against the NTA loss, the $7,700,000 figure has been brought down to about $6,900,000.

Total revenues were $43,849,109 for the year ended Sept. 26, 1961, including a net gain of $32,943 from sales of properties.

Unusual gains from property and earnings from broadcasting stations subsequently disposed of amounted to $1,860,000 in 1960. As a result, the 1960 net loss amounted to $3,088,693 on $46,543,910 revenues.

Because of the "heavy drain on earnings of NT&T" due to its investment in NTA, and "consistent with conservative accounting practice" investment in NTA has been changed to $1 book value.

"This is the end of such drains," prexy Eugene V. Klein, states, "and substantial recoveries are possible."

In 1960, the circuit reduced its theatre holdings from 251 to 220. Currently, NT&T is down to 213 active operations, "leveling off phase."

Klein also notes that theatre revenue is holding its own and is "confident of successful results in 1962."

No Tickets Required; Loan Company Invites Kids to Five Houses

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Twin City Federal Savings & Loan holiday-gifted area youngsters with a free film program last Thursday (28) in the kids' choice of any one of nine nabe theatres.

Five Minneapolis houses and one in suburbia offered "Three Worlds of Gulliver," while three St. Paul situations presented "Seventh Voyage of Sinbad," both pix via Columbia. Kids were invited on a first-come basis, no tickets required.

Promotion, it's understood, vexed the local television timesellers, since Twin City Federal is the heaviest plunger on the channels here. Kiddie film party obviously siphoned off a good chunk of coin the stations figure would have been funneled to them.

Upstairs And Downstairs
(BRITISH-COLOR)

Servant problem in England, tediously scrutinized in overlong farce.

Hollywood, Dec. 28.

Twentieth-Fox release of Betty E. Box production. Stars Michael Craig, Anne Heywood. Mylene Demongeot; with Sidney James, James Robertson Justice. Directed by Ralph Thomas. Screenplay, Frank Harvey; camera (De Luxe), Ernest Steward; editor, Alfred Roome; music, Philip Green. Reviewed at Hollywood Theatre, Dec. 28, '61. Running time, 101 MINS.

The laughs are few and far between in "Upstairs And Downstairs," an episodic British farce comedy that examines, at great length, the problems connected with locating reliable domestics in England. The Betty Box production, being released in the U.S. by 20th-Fox, has already played Manhattan nabe spots. It runs an excessive, ultimately oppressive, 101-minutes, far too lengthy for compatible pairing. Wisely, 20th has chosen not to plant it in the arties—as has been the custom with British comedy exports—for it is most assuredly not in a league with most of the English farce product. But considerable trimming is in order to make this number palatable as support in general U.S. twin-bill playdates.

Screenplay by Frank Harvey describes the plight of a young British couple beset with servant instability. The plot is divided into five sections—in each of which the hired domestic becomes the center of attraction. Of the five thus employed, the first is mad for sailors, the second mad for booze, the third frightened of death of civilized man, the fourth a thief, the fifth in love with her employer. There are patches of merriment in this episodic stew, but most of the time the film is obviously and elaborately laboring to set up punch situations that don't quite register with the intended impact, at least in this country, where domestics in a middle-class situation are pretty much obsolete. Moreover, the final, and lengthiest, episode takes itself seriously, an approach for which the audience is unprepared.

Michael Craig and Anne Heywood are the harassed employers. Neither character is endowed with much in the way of personality. The stars of the show actually are the domestics, but accomplished histrionic efforts in this department are, for the most part, blunted by writing mediocrity and rather ragged, sluggish editing. Key parts are dispatched with some skill by Mylene Demongeot, Sidney James and James Robertson Justice. A certain amount of visual ingenuity by director Ralph Thomas and cameraman Ernest Steward is of helpful comic value. The film is in color, and rather unnecessarily so.

Sasom i en Spegel
(Through a Glass, Darkly)
(SWEDISH)

Stockholm, Dec. 26.

Svensk Filmindustri production and release. Stars Harriet Andersson, Gunnar Bjornstrand, Max von Sydow, Lars Passgard. Directed by Ingmar Bergman. Screenplay by Ingmar Bergman; camera, Sven Nykvist; music, J. S. Bach; editor, Ulla Ryghe. At Roda Kvarn, Stockholm. Running time, 89 MINS.

| Fredrik | Lars Passgard |

Ingmar Bergman in "Through a Glass, Darkly," tells a story that is in many ways reminiscent of "Long Day's Journey Into Night." Pic deals with four members of a family who are estranged from one another through their inability to express feelings for each other. The action is limited to 24 hours in the lives of the four. The time is the nightless Scandinavian summer and the setting is an isolated island in the Baltic. Not a pleasant film, it is a great one.

Main character is Karin, portrayed by Harriet Andersson, who is suffering from a mental ailment. Released from a mental institution, she seeks the security of her childhood, the love of her father (Gunnar Bjornstrand) and her 17-year-old brother (Lars Passgard). She turns more and more away from her husband Martin (Max von Sydow), a doctor and instructor at a medical school.

Martin has been told that she will probably get a relapse and there is little hope of her being cured. Martin sincerely loves her and wants to help, but she is no longer attracted to him. Her father, David, is a popular novelist who has never had any critical success. Younger brother, Fredrik, (Lars Passgard), is at the age when sexual inquisitiveness is awakening.

During the night after the family reunion, voices from Karin's mad world call her. She goes off to an abandoned room in the primitive house to have her mad meeting with the voices from another world. Afterwards she goes to her father's room for the protection of childhood. Her father is working on his latest novel and she soon falls asleep. When she wakes up, her father has gone out and she looks in his diary where she reads that her condition is hopeless. Also that her father is driven by an irresistible desire to study her deterioration in a boat for a day of fishing. Karin and her brother confide inner secrets to one another. The day of youthful fun-making comes to a tragic end when Karin madly seduces her brother. Later, Karin only wants the peace of life in her world of unreality. The Bergman message comes at the end when David speaks personally to his son that he believes: "God exists in love, in every sort of love. maybe God is love."

L'Enlevement Des Sabines
(The Rape of the Sabines)
(FRENCH-ITALIAN-COLOR)

Paris, Jan. 2.

20th-Fox release of CFPI-FICIT production. With Mylene Demongeot, Folco Lulli, Roger Moore, Scilla Gabel, Georgia Moll, Francis Blanche, Jean Marais, Rossana Schiaffino. Directed by Richard Pottier. Screenplay, Carlo Infascelli, Edouardo Anton, Marc-Gilbert Sauvajon; camera (Eastmancolor), Adalberto Albertini; editor, R. Renoux. At Ermitage, Paris. Running time, 100 MINS.

| Father | Folco Lulli |
| Girl | Georgia Moll |
| Roman | Francis Blanche |

Though made in Italy and Yugoslavia, this is primarily a French coproduction. An attempt to get into the antique costumer series, it emerges a weak sister in this category with fast playoffs its main chances.

Early Rome has no women and the leader is the son of the God Mars. Neighboring Sabines have lookers and the Romans manage to get to them. Thus, a war is averted by the girls, now converted to Roman ways.

Direction lacks snap and the attempted recreation of time misfires with the modern dialog somewhat ludicrous. Neither comedy nor spectacle, this film will have to be sold via its cavorting girls, and the theme. Sets looks like production funds were held down. The acting goes off on all tangents.

Technical aspects are also uneven with color lacking snap.

Bonitas Las Tapatias
(Jalisco Gals Are Beautiful)
(MEXICAN)

Mexico City, Dec. 26.

Peliculas Nacionales release of Tele Talia Films production. Stars Elvira Quintana, Joaquin Cordero, Carlos Lopez Moctezuma, Barbara Gil; features Jaime Fernandez, Manola Saavedra, Felix Gonzalez, Arcelia Larranaga and Graciela Lara. Directed by Humberto Gomez Landero. Original story and screenplay, Humberto Gomez Landero. At Olimpia Theatre, Mexico City. Running time, 90 MINS.

Elvira Quintana, comely star of this film, has the distinction of having intepreted more diversified roles than any other Mexican actress—a doctor, anthropologist, singer, femme fatale and female vampire. In this one, she essays the role of a western queen, but an active one. She pitches in to put the bad guys, headed by villain Carlos Lopez Moctezuma, in their place.

The story is simple without any beating around the bush. There's plenty of action and gunplay before Moctezuma is unmasked and gets his just deserts.

Moctezuma turns in his usually good performance as the hypocritical badman masquerading behind the skirts of respectability. Youngster Jaime Fernandez is an adept lieutenant, equally villainous to the point where he actually steals some scenes. Miss Quintana not only is pleasing on the eyes but has a flair for acting. Barbara Gil is also adequate in her role. For beautiful window dressing are Manola Saavedra, Arcelia Larranaga and Graciela Lara who don't get much opportunity except to display their charms to best advantage.

Show Corp. Tactic

attraction was shown four or five times.

Moral provided by the run, the execs feel, is that with the proper attraction, there is money to be made in a theatre's ordinarily dark hours. Mamby and Schneier, however, do not necessarily regard "Midsummer" as simply a "kid picture," though they timed the N.Y. prerelease to take advantage of school vacations. They will do just the opposite, of course, when playing the college towns, and elsewhere plan to set up special "one-nighters," with tickets being sold on a reserved seat, advance admission policy.

Since Show Corp. is a small outfit (Mamby and Schneier are their own salesmen), they will be playing the picture off slowly, as a matter of necessity as well as of policy. And Mamby thinks the picture will still be playing off come 1964, the 400th anniversary of Shakespeare's birth.

How much money do the guys have invested in the off-beat project? They say only "over $100,000," which includes the price they paid J. J. Frankel, who originally acquired the pic in Czechoslovakia, as well as the money spent to get the English-language soundtrack made by Burton and the Old Vic players. Though that's a pretty high price to have paid for a pic of this type, they are confident of eventually realizing a profit, since, in addition to the U.S. theatrical rights, they also have theatrical rights in Great Britain and Australia, as well as television and 16m rights in the aforementioned markets.

by name stars, still being negotiated for.

"The purpose of the film," Niles says, "is to show America the face of the enemy as it really is, to explain the meaning of dialectical materialism and to show the atrocities that have been committed over the years in the name of Communism. It will not be a pretty film. It will in fact be shocking, and we will ask exhibitors to recommend it for adults only."

Niles adds that the picture will not make audiences dislike the Russian people themselves, and he said it would not serve the extreme Right Wing superpatriots in this country by contributing to the hysteria over internal Communism. Niles said the film basically would attempt to make clear the differences in ideology, and he hopes to get endorsements of the film from legislators in Washington.

The true life footage the film will use reportedly has been gleaned from numerous sources, much of it imported from European film libraries. According to Bruce Henry, who has authored the script, none of it comes from extant motion pictures and most of it has never been exhibited theatrically before. Some of it pre-dates the Russian revolution and includes footage of Karl Marx.

Henry, who recently joined the Niles staff, previously had written documentaries for Chet Huntley and a number of educational motion pictures. His credits also include a couple of theatrical features in Hollywood.

recently reversed a decision by which the two children of Oursler Sr.'s first wife were to participate in the estate left by Mrs. Grace Oursler, second wife of Oursler Sr. and mother of Fulton Jr. and April Oursler.

Terms of the contract by which Denker and the Ourslers sold "The Greatest Story" to 20th called for payment of $110,000 over a three-year period, plus 11% of the net profits from the picture. When 20th's board of directors finally turned thumbs down on the projected production last summer, the company sold its rights to producer-director George Stevens who has subsequently made arrangements to do the film for United Artists.

'Obscene' Hard to Define Above Gutter

Columbus, O., Jan. 2.

This city's new 15-member Motion Picture Review Board will study anti-obscenity laws as they exist elsewhere to be better prepared to act against "obscene" films. R. Patrick West, an attorney, was elected chairman. After hearing warnings from Mayor Ralston Westlake, Police Chief George W. Scholar, and City Attorney Russell Leach about how difficult it has been for them and other municipalities to get obscenity convictions, the board decided to study the city ordinance establishing its power, the state law defining obscenity, and other similar laws already on the books.

"The standard (of what is obscene) is only as high as the sidewalk . . . just above the gutter," Leach explained. He said he believed the board should "go out and see the movies, decide what you want to do, then confer with us." The board discussed but arrived at no decision as to whether they should wait for complaints or go out and start checking movies on its own.

However, chairman West said he believed the board should get enough money from City Council to pay its admittance to theatres. The members work without salary.

Inside Stuff—Pictures

Exploitation of "The Second Time Around" by 20th-Fox involved a copyright booboo, which may cost it at least $20,000. This was the using, without permission, of a disk by Gogi Grant to plug via paid radio blurbs the Debbie Reynolds starrer. Miss Grant's platter carries tune by the same title.

According to chirp's attorney, Robert Rifkind, it's "outrageous piracy" of his client's voice and 20th has been told to stop using it and pay up. As Rifkind explains it, 20th has been using 30 second radio spots around the country using soundtrack of Debbie Reynolds voice and then spinning Gogi's disk, giving impression that Debbie is doing the warbling.

Rifkind said that Miss Grant has yielded her voice to only one commercial—that to an oil company—for which she received $20,000. "I feel that when her voice is pirated, it should cost more," he said.

Attorney said that his client and 20th-Fox always did have a good relationship and hoped that it would continue despite this incident.

Actually, he explained, 20th-Fox Record Corp. was licensed to manufacture, reproduce, sell and distribute the record in question in the U. S. and Canada through an agreement with Miss Grant and G. G. Music Inc. However, the contract did not authorize them to use it in paid advertising.

"I beg to differ with the statement that the subject of 'The Children's Hour' is censorable," said Audrey Hepburn at a breakfast press conference for the members of the Hollywood Foreign Press Assn.

"The subject matter of the picture is not perversion. The subject matter of 'The Children's Hour' is lying. The film deals with the tragedy caused by a lie; the death of one woman and the possible shattering of the other woman's life as the result of a child's lie.

"I never believed when I read the play, the script, and did the picture that the women were guilty. I played my role with the complete belief that the woman I played was innocent of wrongdoing.

"In the film the accusation is made; and the girl played by Shirley MacLaine, under the pressure of the situation, begins to doubt herself. She begins to believe certain things about herself that are not necessarily true."

Does circuit owner and assailant of film companies Bennie Berger actually find it profitable to operate the pro league hockey team here at a financial loss because the publicity accruing from this enterprise helps his others so much?

Don Riley, St. Paul Pioneer Press sports columnist, wants to know: "If Ben Berger's serious about shifting his Minneapolis puck franchise to St. Louis, half a dozen red-hot Mill City money men want the upriver (Minneapolis) club. And also the OK to move an ice plant into the Armory," commented Riley in his column.

"And didn't Ben get back his 22 grand loss on last year's hockey club operations three-fold or more in advertising for his various entertainment enterprises?"

Among the aforesaid Berger enterprises are two local movie theatres and one of the city's leading and best patronized supper clubs.

Dogs are still important to the operations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, thanks to Walt Disney, the Mounties have a new breed to work with. When Disney completed his Nikki, Wild Dog of the North, lensed in the Canadian Rockies, he wondered where to find an okay home for the 40 Siberian huskies he had searched world markets for. Supt. W. G. Fraser, head of the RCMP's "G" (for Arctic) Division, said he took 34 of the Siberian dogs, then six more later, and set up a breeding program for the red-coated force at Fort Norman in the Northwest Territories. The immediate aim is to replace all 250 RCMP dogs with the new breed—good workers, easily trained, less vicious and healthier than the Canadian Arctic sled dog.

British Film Producers Assn. has instructed members to disregard a statement of principle regarding membership of the Association of Cinema, Television & Allied Technicians, pending the outcome of the Boulting Bros. vs. ACTT action. In a press statement BFPA says that since putting the point of principle on record the Association's attention was drawn to the said action, so members have been recommended to disregard the statement of principle. But BFPA denies that the statement was made and publicized to put pressure on ACTT in any way in the action. In withdrawing the principle for the time being, BFPA does not "depart in any way from the views expressed."

The appointment, recently disclosed, of Ed Feldman as ad-pub veep of Seven Arts Productions will allow Tex McCrary to devote most of his time now to the Grand Bahama Development Corp. McCrary, a veep and director of Seven Arts Productions' Canadian parent, Seven Arts Ltd., had previously been supervising SAP's ad-pub activities on the film side. The Grand Bahama Development Corp. is a resort, residential and commercial real estate venture in the Bahamas in which SA Ltd. has a $5,000,000 interest.

Pat Boone's Cooga Mooga productions has registered a protest against Stanley Kramer's "A Child Is Waiting" on the basis of prior registration of Marc Siegel's "A Child Is Crying." Latter was registered Feb. 20, 1961, while Kramer listed "Waiting" March 13, 1961. Two companies will go into arbitration over titles this week. Kramer property is skedded for production early next year, with Burt Lancaster and Judy Garland starring and John Cassavetes directing.

George Sidney and Fred Kohlmar production companies are partnered in "Bye Bye Birdie" for Columbia Pictures release, similar to the deal in which Kohlmar and Mervyn LeRoy were paired on "The Devil at 4 O'Clock." Sidney also will direct. Project will precede production on five films Sidney is prepping for Col: "Return Fare," "Here Come the Brides," "Lady Is a Dame," "Diamond Bikini" and "The Trap."

HARASSMENT BY REFORMERS

MAYOR PUTS ONE OUT OF BUSINESS

Fort Wayne, Ind., Jan. 2.

Little Art Theatre, operated by LeRoy Griffith, has ceased operations, faced by the building owner's edict to move, and the threat of a license revocation hearing by Mayor Paul M. Burns, who had been trying to obtain such a hearing since last August, when the theatre showed the nudie film, "Hideout in the Sun."

An injunction suit to prevent the license revocation hearing kept the theatre from closing until the decision was made by Special Judge Otto Grant early in December. Judge Grant held that the city had the authority to hold the hearing.

Meanwhile, E. H. Kilbourne said he had terminated the lease, pointing out that the move is costing him $27,000 on a five-year lease, and about $22,500 to remodel the building. However, he said he felt the loss was worth it because, "I live here."

In the injunction suit, Judge Grant ruled that the city ordinance provides that no indecent or lewd movies be shown under the terms of the license. He said concern was the matter of standards, and said it had been concluded that the words "lewd" and "immoral" were synonymous, and such showings are protested by "the ordinary person."

Judge Grant said it was his opinion that the evidence did not show Mayor Burns would be unfair or prejudiced or capricious in deciding on the nature of the film, "Hideout in the Sun."

"If I overruled the motion, it seems that local authority would be helpless to take action no matter how obscene the movies were that a theatre operator might choose to show. This theatre manager (Gerald Allen) has applied for and received a license which presumably contains provisions that no lewd films may be shown. If he exhibits lewd films, the municipality is not powerless."

'C'-Rated 'Liaisons' Draws Legion's Denunciation And Near-Capacity Biz

The Roman Catholic Legion of Decency has given a condemned (C) rating to Astor Pictures' French import, "Les Liaisons Dangereueses." Rating is accompanied by an especially sharp denunciation which states that "the film's theme of seduction is more nearly a diabolical mockery of virtue," and adds that there "are numerous sequences which are pornographic in their intent."

Pointing out that the film does not have a Production Code seal, LOD also says the picture "makes a false pretense to be moral in theme by the introduction of a patently contrived crime-does-not-pay ending."

Meanwhile, Astor execs have flatly denied that "Liaisons," which opened to mixed reviews at the Henry Miller Theatre in New York two weeks ago, was going to be evicted within six weeks by the arrival of the legit play, "The Umbrella," as reported by a columnist. They say that the film is doing near capacity business on its $2 ree-a-day, hardticket showing and that the Miller's management put up an advance of $100,000 to get the pic. Contract also is said to specify that management can cut the run only after pic's weekly gross has fallen below $15,000 for four weeks in a row.

With the way the boxoffice is ticking now, Astor expects receipts well above the $15,000-mark for some months to come and tickets are on sale up through July 4.

One Astor exec suggested the column rumor was a "plant" by someone connected with the theatre who assumed that "mixed" reviews for a film are as devastating as for a play, and that the pic would have a lean time of it. He added: "If the theatre wants to give us $100,000, we'd be happy to find another house."

Columbus' 'Obscenity' Patrol

Columbus, O., Jan. 2.

Motion Picture Review Board which was recently created here will use ratings of the Inter-Faith Council to guide it in a search for "obscenity" in films. R. Patrick West, chairman of the review board, said the group has adopted a method of procedure for its work.

When the Inter-Faith Council reports that a film being shown in the city is dubious, West will assign five members of the 15-member board to view it. The board will operate the same on the basis of complaints from private citizens. A sub-chairman will be named to head the five-member group each time a film is to be viewed. The five members may see the film together or singly. If a majority of the five believe scenes in the film violate the state anti-obscenity law, the group will ask the police to prosecute the exhibiter.

City Prosecutor Bernard Chupka told the board that in order to get a case to stand up in court, all five members of the viewing group should agree that a violation of the law exists. Chupka pointed out that a split vote by five members of the board would weaken any case in court.

A TASTE FOR POWER

Magazines To Film Censoring Ambition

Milwaukee, Jan. 2.

Having experienced a measure of success in keeping what they term "objectionable" literature off the newsstands of their community, a group of citizens in nearby Wauwatosa is now setting its sights on "objectionable" films.

The group, Combat by name, comprising representatives of both Catholic and Protestant churches, as well as of various civic and fraternal organizations, is now regularly publishing a list of films classified as suitable for entire family, for adults and adoleseents and for adults only. The ratings generally follow those made by the Milwaukee Better Films Council, with which Combat is affiliated, and those made by the Roman Catholic Legion of Decency.

W. C. Michel Chairs 20th's Celebration Keyed to Skouras

Twentieth-Fox this week is launching a 13-week worldwide sales celebration in honor of prexy Spyros P. Skouras' 20th anniversary as head of the company. Plans for the "celebration" (not "drive") were disclosed in New York by general sales manager Glenn Norris at a special trade press conference Thursday (28). All departments of the company—distribution, production, tv, music and records—will participate.

Norris expressed hope that exhibition, both at home and abroad, will take the opportunity of the celebration to express their appreciation for the leadership which the 20th prexy has given the industry over the past two decades. He also reported that news of the celebration hadn't yet been given to Skouras, though one of the reporters at the conference pointed out that Skouras might have been given a hint if he'd been in the homeoffice lobby recently; a huge satin banner proclaiming the "celebration" was already hanging just opposite the main entrance.

William C. Michel, exec veep, will be worldwide chairman of the drive, with Emanuel Silverstone, 20th International veep, overseeing specific plans in the foreign field. Domestic chairman will be Martin Moskowitz, assistant general sales manager.

Norris, who reported that domestic bookings for the first three quarters of 1961 were 30,000 over the total for 1960, said he hoped the momentum provided by the new 13-week drive would carry on over into the remaining 1962 quarters. He also noted that the 1961 booking rise had been accomplished despite the fact that fewer pictures had been released than in 1960. Also participating in the press conference, Emmanuel Silverstone reported that 20th's foreign bookings were up about 5% in 1961 over 1960. Murray Silverstone, prexy of 20th International, currently is abroad setting plans for the drive, as well as taking care of other 20th business.

Chicago Trying Censorship Again, New Law Same-Only-Different

Chicago, Jan. 2.

The Chicago City Council last week passed a new motion picture censorship ordinance. It's basically the same as the one that was knocked out by the courts in 1959, but legally gerrymandered to fit the court decisions that resulted in its predecessor's downfall. The major changes are a reduction in the "adults only" age limit from 21 to 17, and the creation of a Motion Picture Appeal Board to review films denied permits by the police censor board.

The Council accepted two minor amendments on the floor but overwhelmingly voted against other changes and motions to delay passage. The two amendments, introduced by Alderman Leon Despres (an opponent of the entire bill), exempts newsreels from the ordinance and strikes out a vague phrase ("or is otherwise unsuitable for children") from the section describing pictures limited to those under 17. Television newsreels covered the hearings.

The ordinance requires that all films shown by theatres or penny arcades, whether an admission fee is charged or not, must first be submitted to a Film Review Section under the supervision of the superintendent of police. At least three members of the six-man Section must see the film in its entirety. The fee for the permit is $3 per thousand lineal feet.

The new law requires the police superintendent to sign all permits and denial of permits, thus overcoming one of the courts' objections in "The Lovers" case earlier this year. The Film Review Section had largely been a patronage office, giving jobs to the widows of police captains and other political insiders. It probably will remain so. Although Police Superintendent O. W. Wilson did not testify on the current ordinance, he has previously voiced the opinion that censorship should not be a police function.

The Film Review Section will deny a permit of any kind to a film it considers ". . . obscene, or portrays depravity, criminality, or lack of virtue of a class of citizens of any race, color, creed or religion and exposes them to contempt, derision, or obloquy, or tends to produce a breach of the peace or riots, or purports to represent any hanging, lynching or burning of a human being . . ."

The criteria for the "adults only" tag is ". . . if the picture, considered as a whole, has the dominant effect of substantially arousing sexual desires in any person less than seventeen years of age, or if the picture is indecent, or is contrary to contemporary community standards in the description or representation of nudity or sex."

The new five-man Motion Picture Appeal Board will be appointed by the mayor and will consist of persons "experienced or educated in one or more of the following fields: art, drama, literature, philosophy, sociology, psychology, history, music, science or other related fields." They'll be paid $50 a day.

Unable to forestall the ordinance in its entirety, Alderman Despres, of the fifth (Univ. of Chicago) ward, submitted his own bill. It would have permitted no banning of films for adults, would have given exhibitors the right to subpoena witnesses for the review hearings, and would have required members of the Review Board to have at least five years of direct work in one of the listed fields and/or a Ph.D. in the field. Despres' ordinance was voted down without discussion.

The Council session at which the ordinance was passed was characterized more by wrangling and personal invective between Despres and other aldermen than it was by discussion of the issues. Several of the aldermen who were in favor of some sort of censorship spoke out against the haste with which the administration pushed this bill through the local legislative channels. It was introduced into the Finance Committee only eight days before it came to the Council floor for a vote, and was given to a subcommittee without the usual three days' notice of hearings. City Hall observers said that less significant legislation had received substantially greater hearing time. The final vote was 39 to 3 for the ordinance.

Overnight Two Alabama Kiddies Get Peck as Pop

Birmingham, Jan. 2.

Mary Badham, 9, daughter of Gen. and Mrs. H. L. Badham Jr., will play the role of "Scout" in "To Kill a Mockingbird" and Phillip Alford, 13, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lem Alford, will have the role of "Jem," both leading parts in the forthcoming film.

The local youngsters will play with Gregory Peck, who will portray their father, "Atticus Finch," in the film.

They were chosen from several hundred interviewed all through the South and were taken to New York City for screen tests. Young Alford has appeared in three Town and Gown plays here but it is Mary's first attempt at acting.

The youngsters will leave for Hollywood this week for rehearsals which will start in mid-January.

Feature, to be based on Harper Lee's Pulitzer Prize winning novel —on the top 10 list of best sellers for 72 weeks—will be made by Pakula and Mulligan Productions, in association with Peck's Anthony Productions, for release by Universal Pictures.

Production will start in February.

EL PASO 'CLASSIFIES'

El Paso, Tex., Jan. 2.

A film-rating service will be established here, in which local exhibitors and the Women's Chamber of Commerce will join. The decision to provide information on pictures came after several meetings between the women's organization. The women emphasized that their efforts to obtain a classification system did not constitute a movement to introduce "censorship" in the city.

The ratings to be published each week in the local dailies will rate the pictures as to their suitability for adults, mature young people, young people and children.

LIVES IN DREAD OF BLUENOSES

Oakwood, O., Jan. 2.

Edward Eads, 31, manager of the Far Hills Theatre, only film house in this city, adjacent to Dayton, has for the second time been found guilty of exhibiting an "obscene" film, by Oakwood Municipal Judge Fredrick Howell. The film, "The Immoral Mr. Teas," shown on Sept. 6, was ruled to be that.

Eads was previously convicted of showing "The Sins of Youth," and fined $2,500 and sentenced to the workhouse for six months by the same judge. The sentence was held in abeyance pending Eads' appeal of the decision.

He faces two more similar charges. Meanwhile U. S. District Judge Carl A. Weinman in Federal Court at Dayton was asked to enjoin Oakwood officials and citizens from arresting Eads and prosecuting him under Ohio's obscenity laws. In the federal action, Eads asked that the defendants be restricted from "harassing" or interfering with him in his duties as theatre manager. He contended the campaign by the defendants deprives him of his civil rights. He further asserted his reputation has suffered, and a strain has been placed upon his family. In a sworn statement, Eads claimed police in Oakwood have deliberately caused him to be fearful of imminent arrest, and have conspired with holier-than-thou forces to intimidate him.

He said he is without policymaking power in the theatre's operation. He denied having knowledge of the contents of the films that have been confiscated by Oakwood police. The charges he has yet to face are in connection with the showing of three other films branded "obscene" by investigators—"Twilight Girls," "Fast Set," a double feature shown Sept. 10, and Brigitte Bardot's "Love Is My Profession," shown early in November.

Defendants in the Federal suit are: Judge Howell, City Manager A. C. Bergman, Police Chief L. M. Lynch; E. E. Miles, clerk of court; F. S. McDaniel, city prosecutor; Rev. H. E. Kocher, rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church; Sgt. D. Porter, R. E. Oseit, and Patrolman R. V. Grewe as well as 11 private citizens who had signed affidavits against various films.

In the Oakwood hearing, no date for sentencing was set for the violation in regard to "The Immoral Mr. Teas." Harry Wright, Eads' counsel, had argued that the film was similar to a nudist movie or like a photograph of a nude person. Judge Howell wrote,

"The court can only say . . . that he has never seen a picture of a nude person in a magazine walk and display themselves as they did on the screen. . . . The motion picture goes beyond mere nudity . . . containing that which has a tendency to excite lascivious thoughts and arouse lustful desires."

Wright's motion for a change of venue and for a dismissal of the charge on grounds the release was not "obscene" and that the state did not prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt were overruled by Judge Howell, who also held that the state's obscenity laws were constitutional.

Far Hills operation is also the subject of a third suit, in which Adolph Herman, president of Far Hills Theatre Inc., is seeking $1,350,000 in damages from four filed affidavits of complaints against the various films. He claimed the 16 defendants have "conspired together" for the purpose of injury to the theatre's business, saying that as a result, the reputation of the Far Hills theatre has been maligned and damaged, and that Herman would continue to suffer losses in the operation of his business in the sum of $1 million. The $350,000 is sought as punitive damages. This suit is pending in Montgomery County Common Pleas Court, Dayton.

Jaffe at $1,750, $250 Expenses; Briskin Wages & Labors Both Cut; Schwartz's 7,500-Share Option

New employment contract given Leo Jaffe, 1st-v.p.-treasurer of Columbia, okayed by stockholders at a New York meeting last week, provides the exec with a weekly salary of $1,500 (same as he had been getting) through to last July 4 and then $1,750 weekly. Pact is for seven years and five months from last Feb. 27.

Jaffe also receives a weekly allowance of $250, the Col Screen Gems subsidiary pays one-third of his salary and the Col board at its discretion after three and a half years could elect to raise the stipend.

Jaffe also was given an option to purchase 15,000 Col common shares at $27.55 per share and 10,000 Screen Gems shares at $16.50 per share. These prices were not less than 95% of market value at the time granted.

Studio v.p. Samuel J. Briskin has a new employment pact for three years from April 21, 1961, providing a weekly salary of $1,750 (as he had been getting) for the first year, and $1,250 for the second two years. He's going on an advisory basis, with Sol A. Schwartz taking over the reins. Also for Briskin a stock option for 7,500 shares at $27.55 per share.

Schwartz has an option for 7,500 shares at $21.85 per share, this price also being not less than 95% of market value on date of grant. Similar situation obtains with Mike J. Frankovich, Col International v.p., whose new five-year employment deal includes an option for 7,500 Col shares at $26.31 per share.

Tower-Now-Crest Ready

Denver, Jan. 2.

Denver is to have another first run theatre starting New Year's Eve when the completely remodeled Tower Theatre is reopened as the Crest under Wolfberg Theatres ownership.

The first run policy for the upper Park Hill former sub-run house will be inaugurated with a one day showing of Willie Wilder's new European comedy "One, Two, Three," which will later be shown at the company's other first run hardtop, the Paramount in downtown Denver late in January.

According to Tom Smiley, president and general manager of the Wolfberg chain, which also operates seven drive-ins in the Denver area, only the shell of the old Tower Theatre remains. New projection equipment and wide screen have been installed, as well as 750 new push-back seats replacing the 900 odd conventional hard back theatre seats. New marque of contemporary design with elaborate lighting effects and a completely redecorated and refurbished interior will complete the theatre's transformation.

John Stembler, Olive Branch in Hand, Sounds Happy Note for 1962

John H. Stembler, prez of Theatre Owners of America, expresses "cautious hope" for further filmbiz upbeat in 1962.

Scanning the new twelvemonth outlook, the Atlanta circuit exec is cheered by the prospect of a higher product total, but counsels again for intratrade harmony. "It behooves production and distribution, for their own self-enlightened interest, to work more closely with exhibition," he states. And for their part, exhibs "must act in an equally responsible and cooperative manner in seeking solutions to our industry's problems."

In the olive branch vein, Stembler promises the trade can expect "positive action" from TOA to attempt to demonstrate to producers that money can be made by important releases in the slower periods, as well as in holiday engagements.

On subject of pay-tv, he finds solace in fact that no home toll system is currently operative in the U.S. And so long as exhibs keep the pressure on, "there is nothing to indicate that it could get underway in any appreciable force" in the new year.

'KINGS' ADVANCE EQUALS 'BEN-HUR' IN TOKYO

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

Advance sales for "King of Kings" (Metro) at Theatre Tokyo was about same as advance for "Ben-Hur" (Metro) at same house, with some $61,000 in the coffers from sales of 64,000 tickets before film opened.

Francesco Rodriguez, Japan manager for Metro, predicts a run of at least a year for the new Biblical.

Re Change of Locale

Silver Spring, Md.

Editor, VARIETY:

When I read some months ago that the locale of the then forthcoming movie, "By Love Possessed," would be New England (instead of Pennsylvania) I marveled at the insensitivity of the adapters of James Gould Couzzens' novel. Now in your recent review you say that the small eastern town was "switched, for no apparent reason, from Maryland to Massachusetts," and I am again distressed by what seems a chronic inability to understand Couzzens' clear road directions. To any Pennsylvanian, and particularly to any Pennsylvania lawyer, it is absurd to place the action anywhere but in Pennsylvania, probably in Bucks County.

By the way, I am especially fascinated by the transplanting of the Pennsylvania Dutch name of the character Helen Detweiler to Massachusetts. While Detweilers may not be as rare in Massachusetts as Ezekiah Hopkinses are in Lebanon (see Conan Doyle's "The Red Headed League"; there are four Detweilers or Detwilers in the current Boston telephone directory), the name is certainly a tipoff on the area involved in the novel.

Condensed Dew Hurts L.A. Ozoners

Los Angeles, Jan. 2.

Dense fog has been creating a serious problem for L.A. drive-in operators during past three weeks. Theatremen say it's the most sustained blanketing of the area in memory, and has caused as many as 20 zoners to be shuttered in a single night.

One night last week (27) was typical, when more than 20 failed to open and others were forced to shutter after a single show. It was estimated that the loss at the 20 drive-ins which didn't open was a minimum of $18,000, most of it absorbed by Pacific Drive-In Theatres, although several of the houses are operated by indies.

Levathes' Maxim: A Polished Script Must Precede Go-Ahead at 20th

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Greater emphasis on themes designed for greater potential at the international boxoffice will keynote 20th-Fox production in 1962, according to studio production head Peter G. Levathes.

"We are gearing our production to the world-wide market and plan to increase our revenue by building our foreign grosses."

Levathes said the company will spend the same amount of money next year as in 1961, "even though we will make fewer pictures." He declined to mention figures stating a number of pix are still in production and there is no telling how the final score will wind up.

Exec again noted all 1962 releases will be in the can by early February, a record for 20th.

"Our program for the next production year will be highly selective. We are going all out on everything we decide to do."

Levathes asserted 15 pix to be made by the studio will be selected from approximately 30 properties to be narrowed down. "Our standards of selection will be higher than ever before."

While the studio will produce 15, these are exclusive of "Cleopatra," which Levathes indicated should be ready for release next November, and "The Longest Day," a tentative July, 1962 release. Former pic is Walter Wanger production being directed by Joseph Mankiewicz in Italy and Egypt with a stellar cast headed by Elizabeth Taylor. Latter film is Darryl F. Zanuck Production being lensed in France by Zanuck.

Two Richard Zanuck pix, "Fate Is the Hunter" and "Shock Treatment," if completed in time, will be included in the 15 studio projects. These also will come under D. F. Z. Productions banner.

Details on pix to be produced next year were lacking despite various "announcements" by producers on the lot. Levathes took the position that unless the scripts are right he will not give the green light to any project. Each script has to meet the "criteria" for world-wide potential.

Order also affects two pix slated to start next month. These include Marilyn Monroe starrer "Something's Got To Give" and Irwin Allen's "Five Weeks In A Balloon." Former has been skedded to go before camera first week in January. "Balloon" latter part of the month.

George Cukor, who will direct David Brown production with Miss Monroe, has already reported on the lot. However, feelings among those identified with the project are that there may be a delay, depending on the star and when she reports at the studio.

Levathes noted the distribution and advertising department in New York is concentrating its resources on all forthcoming releases.

Glenn Norris, sales head, and Charles Einfeld, ad-pub topper, are making "big plans and will tour the country on a series of trade meetings to sell our product for all it is worth," 20th studio head commented.

Both execs were studio visitors recently, viewing newly wound pix in rough form and parts of others in production here and abroad. Idea of looksee was to provide ammunition for exhib seshes.

Levathes planed to the coast Sunday (31) after 10-day h.o. visit and spending the holidays with his family there.

Locally Traveling Boxoffice

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Pantages Theatre has set the first local traveling boxoffice, a 26 foot trailer, to tour Southern California areas for three months as a ticket sales office for "Judgment at Nuremberg." Tour started Dec. 4, with similar traveling boxoffice starting Dec. 11 in New York for picture's run there.

Trailer, which features a fullsize 24 sheet on one side, is designed to open in the back, with built in bleachers and a screen and rear projection projector to show scenes from the picture. It goes to a Safeway store in Tarzana today, with stops skedded at similar shopping and community centers in Canoga Park and Reseda lined up so far. A boxoffice crew will be maintained.

United Artists pic opens Dec. 23, following charity premieres for the Tracy Clinic on Dec. 21 and Young Men of Sinai-Cedars Hospital on Dec. 22.

Berger's Allied Unit's Convention Date Fluid to Conform With Antitruster Lee Loevenger

By ROBERT REES

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Reactivated North Central Allied, having declared war against the distributors at the very outset of its new life, expects to have Lee Loevenger, head of the Dept. of Justice's antitrust division, present at its first convention since coming into being again.

Loevenger has been invited to speak and has accepted. Plans are to inform him of small exhibitors' grievances against the film companies and to try to learn if grounds exist for having the companies indicted or sued.

The convention was originally set for Jan. 9 which date was changed to the 13. However, when its was learned that Loevenger will be in the Twin Cities this month or next on government business and to visit relatives—he's a former Minneapolitan—a decision was reached to defer the meeting until the government's attorney is here.

When that's learned the convention time will be made to coincide.

Ways to knock out compulsory percentage for small town theatres and to combat other sales policies which allegedly are "murdering" the "little" theatreowners will be the main considerations at the convention, according to current strategy.

The new unit chief, Martin Lebedoff has made known that he'll also try to commit the body to a policy of lawsuits against the film companies "to bring them to their senses" whenever it's believed causes for such court actions exist. He asserts he wants NCA to camp on the courthouse steps and to start the law suits immediately—one after another—"so that exhibs' legal rights can be regained."

Berger avows that he's too busy with his many varied interests, in addition to his theatre chain, to be a candidate for the NCA presidency again when the convention holds its election of officers.

Since NCA's rebirth, he claims, the membership campaign has reaped a good harvest. Also is assured, he says, a large turnout of smalltown theatre owners throughout the territory, including many who haven't joined up yet.

If Patriotic Sentiments Wanted, 'Spartacus' File Full as Stay-at-Home

Anent "runaway" it's been just the reverse with "Spartacus." The Bryna production via Universal has been collecting salutes as something like a model of patriotism.

Latest back-pat gesture is from the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce, which, like the Coast technicians, is admiring of Kirk Douglas, the film's star (and Bryna topper), for making the pic principally in California.

The proud Universal claim is that "Spartacus" provided more work to actors, technicians and extras in L.A. than any other feature on record. The U bookkeeping notes an outlay of $8,750,000 was made to craft labor, plus some $3,000,000 to performers, including stars.

Memory of how the production went well over budget suggests that a goodly portion of the monetary largesse was an inadvertence.

NABES TURN FIRSTRUN, HIRE FREELANCE P.A.

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Film exploiteer Morrie Steinman who operates his own publicity shop here is lining up nabe houses, who have none, now that they play "first run."

Circuit owner Harold Field hired him to exploit two of current local neighborhood firstruns, "One, Two, Three" (UA) and "Hey, Let's Twist!" (Par) at the Field St. Louis Park and Uptown Theatres, respectively.

For Paramount's "Hey, Let's Twist," Steinman arranged first local twist dance contest on the Uptown's stage. House put up $100 in cash prizes and the neighborhood merchants to contribute other rewards for the winers.

BROTHER REVIEWERS

Cowles A.M. and P.M. Sheets Differ In Views

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

The same picture, "Pocketful of Miracles" (UA) at Ben Berger's loop firstrun Gopher for the holidays, got a panning in one of the only two local dailies, the Morning Tribune, and a rave review in the other, the Evening Star.

What's odd, perhaps, is that both sheets are owned and published by the same person, John Cowles, which undoubtedly made it difficult for the newspapers' readers to know—and both sheets go to very many of the same people—whom to believe.

The Tribune's critic, Ben Kern, rapped the picture hard—and he usually is a kindly disposed reviewer. On the other hand, Star columnist Don Morrison, who also reviews many pictures, in his notice called film "delightful."

Kern's review appeared first—Morrison's not until several days later. The picture didn't do well its first week, but now is in its second.

Goldwurm's New Buy; News of Li'l Carn's 10th

Times Film Corp. has purchased U.S. distrib rights to Michelangelo Antonioni's still-in-work drama, "Eclipse," starring Monica Vitti and Alain Delon. Jean Goldwurm, prexy, revealed in New York last week. Announcement came in the course of a trade press lunch called to mark 10th anniversary of Goldwurm's acquisition of the Little Carnegie Theatre, N.Y. artie. In addition to distributing pix and owning the Carnegie, Goldwurm also operates the World Theatre in New York, which specializes in exploitation product.

Goldwurm declined to disclose the price for the new Italo pic, saying only that it's the biggest ever paid by Times. Pic, which will be released next year, will be the third Antonioni film to be seen this side within a 12-month period—the first being Janus Films' "L'Avventura" and the second being Lopert's "La Notte," which opens in February.

A public debate on humanism and the cinema among a group of French pic directors and two Russian filmmakers had some reflections worth quoting. Oldtimer Rene Clair maintained that the public was not always right but that any filmmaker who did not respect it was always wrong. Claude Chabrol said he was trying to get at the mechanism of reality in his films, and Russki director Grigori Choukrai ("Ballad of a Soldier") felt that a historic optimism had to be maintained in films while avoiding academic aspects. Among those involved were Jean Rouch, Armand Gatti, Serge Yutkevitch, Jean-Paul Le Chanois, and Louis Daquin. . . A French-Spanish-Italian project for making a pic version of "Don Quixote" with Fernandel now being finalized. Fernandel says he wants to play it straight without grimacing and the comedy only in the situations and not in the character who was deadly in earnest about his knighthood.

Marcel Camus, who made "Black Orpheus," now winding a pic with non-actors in the Far East "Bird of Paradise." Distrib, Speva Films, claims it has already been sold for the whole world. UA has it for the U. S. and the rest of the world except France, Italy, West Germany, Belgium and Switzerland . . . Anatole Litvak shooting his new pic, still temporarily called "The Third Dimension," at Saint Maurice Studios with Sophia Loren and Anthony Perkins. UA has it for the U. ### Rome

Actress Giulietta Masina, of "La Strada" and other Federico Fellini flicks, will be in her husband's next picture, as yet untitled. The film is to start in March with Marcello ("Dolce Vita") Mastroianni playing the male lead . . . Producer Fulvio Lucisano of Italian International Film, will do "Atlantic Attack," from a story by Ron W. Alcorn. It starts in March under the direction of "a noted American actor," unnamed, who will make his debut as director. Lucisano has just finished production of "The War Goes On" with Jack Palance.

Sophia Loren had a busy day on Dec. 23. Actress took overnight train from Paris, where she's shooting film directed by Anatole Litvak, arriving in Rome in the morning to personally hand over Christmas gift packages to 2000 Roman children at the Adriano Theatre. Then to the Excelsior Hotel to greet child guests at traditional Christmas dinner offered to Rome orphans by Baron Renato Cini. The same evening she went to Pisa to attend world preem of "Madame Sans Gene" at the Giuseppe Verdi Community Theatre for the benefit of the Italian Red Cross.

Italian Pix Producers Now Using Tele to Bally Major Product

Rome, Dec. 26.

Italian producers have taken to launching their major productions via the tele route. Restricted to big-budgeted items, promotion consists of live tv coverage, over Italy's RAI-TV net, of gala preems, usually benefit affairs held in Italy's major opera houses. This includes presentation of stars and other celebs present, a few comments by the producer and some key scenes from pic.

Method was first adopted by Dino DeLaurentiis and successfully used for several of his recent hit pix, such as "The Great War," "Last Judgment" and others. Current holiday stretch will see no less than two such openings, one for DeLaurentiis' "Barabbas" at the Rome Opera House, the other for Maleno Malenotti's "Madame Sans-Gene," a Sophia Loren starrer, at Pisa's Teatro Verdi. Fact that only one day separates the two affairs has sparked a race to see who gets the most personalities to attend.

Another pic, Disney's "101 Dalmatians," also stands to benefit from upcoming video exposure over RAI-TV. However, the film will not get the "premiere" treatment, but will not get the "prement, but will be a feature of a topranking local tele presentation, "Studio One," Christmas stanza of which will be dedicated to Disney.

Metro's Unreleased 20 Offered for Japanese Outside Quota Plan

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

MGM will offer about 20 post-1948 features for deals with Japanese importer-distributors. Most of the films have never been released here because of import quota system, still effective. Metro currently is allowed 15 licenses annually.

Titles to be offered include "Two Loves," "Jailhouse Rock," "Battle Circus," "Ada," "Dream Wife," "Malaya," "East Side, West Side" and "Key to the City."

Practice here is to choose action fare over dramas and other types in marginal decisions. Action fare represents an almost predictable income in smaller situations.

Paris Legit Hits Stem From Names

Paris, Dec. 26.

It would appear that the cult of the individual is taking precedence over the play these days in French legit shows. Several new pieces, likely to get runs, appear to thrive on the name players rather than the properties.

Marcel Ayme's legiter, "Les Maxibules," got so-so reviews but raves for actor Jacques Dufilho who enacts a bevy of roles and comments on the proceedings. Raymond Devos, a fine vaude comic, received high praise for his work in the revue, "Les Pupitres" (The Music Stands). It appears in for a run.

Sophie Desmarets saved the French version of "The Marriage-Go-Round" (Adieu Pridence) with her witty portrayal of the wife while Roger Nicolas' usual comic routines have put over the old-fashioned operetta, "A Toi De Jouer" (Your Turn).

Louis De Funes is credited with making a revival of Claude Magnier's farce "Oscar" a sock success as ditto Jacques Fabbri's cavorting as Falstaff in a French version of Shakespeare's "The Merry Wives

DESPITE GLOOM, PROD. LOOKS UP

By EMIL ZUBRYN

Mexico City, Dec. 26.

It was only about six years ago that the Mexican picture industry underwent a radical reorganization which had goal of freeing it from obstacles hindering its development. But although the new-lease-on-life plan was hailed then as the salvation of the industry, there was not the expected strengthening of economic, production, exhibition and distribution factors. End result has been a steady slide downward to a new low level and the most critical situation of all since the inception of the seventh art in Mexico.

All phases of the industry now gloomily admit that 1961 was the poorest, with a total of 42 completed pictures, although just before the year-end producers and unions settled their differences in the matter of consecutive hiring of technical units by roll. Four new pictures went before the cameras, but these, technically, cannot be included in the 1961 total since completion was not affected before Dec. 31.

It is difficult to pinpoint where the fault lies, in an industry beset by multiple problems, added to the lack of coordination, constant labor-management bickerings, and personal animosities, jealousies and the ire raised by greater federal intervention in the industry. Certainly financial troubles have not been resolved by the government's acquisition of the two major exhibition chains for a reputed $24,000,000. And the Film Bank has provided advance budget cash ranging from a low of $3,600,000 for 1961 to over double this amount in better years.

Mexican pictures undeniably were hard hit by political unrest and the weak currency in Latin

Marked-With-Red Houses Off-Limit For U.S. Product

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

Far East Motion Picture Export Assn. vp. Irving Maas left for a four-week swing that will include stops in Manila, Vietnam and Indonesia.

Before leaving, Maas indicated possible solution soon of knotty problem in Hong Kong whereby U.S. Treasury placed certain key theatres off limits for U.S. products because they are allegedly owned or tied in with Communist interests.

Maas expected compromise to be worked out whereby permission is granted by Treasury rep for theatres to get green light to show high percentage of films from Free World, American product naturally dominating.

Distrib By Smuggling

Frankfurt, Dec. 26.

So you think it's tough to get a film distributed? How about this! A year ago a German distributor started negotiations with Hungarian producer, Istvan Szoets, to show his picture, "Song of Cornfields," in Germany. Deal was completed, but when Szoets tried to get an okay from the Hungarian government to export his pic, not only was a release permit refused, but the government tried to confiscate all prints.

Szoets, who also directed this controversial film about his countryland, escaped over border to Austria last week. In the little knapsack that he carried along was one print of the pic. It is now slated for January release in West Germany.

French Filmite Sees U.S. Production Abroad as Big Boost to Europe

Paris, Jan. 2.

Thank goodness for the growing American filmmaking abroad, says a French pix producer here who prefers to remain nameless. He says that he means mainly the spectacles which could be a big help in aiding European producers find their way with this type of picture, still rated primarily an American specialty.

He points to the flooding of local screens by European and American-made costumers, and the fact that Yank entries appear head and shoulders above the seemingly skimpy European attempts at this kind of film. The money that Americans can pour into these films may be an important factor, but, above all, it is the knowhow that is evident and from which European filmites can learn a lot, he claims.

He points to "El Cid," as having the sweep and grandeur that a film of this type should have. He claims the French pic, "The Rape of the Sabines," is a badly conceived affair alongside "Cid."

This French producer cited a leading French film critic who once wrote, "An American film is like a drink of bubbling, heady champagne." He opines that the U.S. spectacles are direct, dynamic, and that the violence is staged with the proper intensity and romantic sadism but rarely exploited for its own sake.

Europeans just cannot seem to match this or get the right mood and flair into their adventure films. He admits that the Italians have succeeded in some of their ancient costumers by sheer exuberance. French attempts are usually just too talky and are so concerned with logic they lose the pace so necessary in these type of pix.

European Locales Logical

Making U.S. spectacles in Europe that have Continental locales is just common sense to this producer. "Cid" never could have approximated the castles, landscapes and towns of old Spain in America.

U.S. Pix Standout In Berlin Xmas

Berlin, Dec. 26.

An unusually strong lineup of U.S. pix has been released here during the second part of December. Checkup on West Berlin's Christmas cinema program reveals that 10 of the 18 local firstruns had pix of American origin over the holidays. The remainder included five German films while one pic each was of French, Italian and Swedish nationality.

The 10 stateside films included "Pongo and Perdita" (Disney), "Come September" (U), "Judgment at Nuremberg" (UA), "Ben-Hur" (M-G), "One, Two, Three" (UA), "King of Kings" (M-G), "On Double" (Par), "Cinerama Holiday" (Cinerama), "South Pacific" (20th) and the reissue of "Spiral Staircase."

Of the above films, two United Artists releases had their world preems here: Stanley Kramer's "Judgment at Nuremberg" and Billy Wilder's "One, Two, Three." The latter was preemed Dec. 18 at Gloria Palast. It drew varied reviews for which, however, also the German dubbing may be made responsible. City's No. 1 critic, Friedrich Luft, put the question whether such comedies can be dubbed into German at all. Der Abend, local boulevard paper, verbally wrote: The German translators have bungled the original. However, "One, Two, Three" is a b.o. hit on Kurfuerstendamm. Greater part of the audience sees in this quickwitted comedy one of the most laughable pix of the season.

Disney's full-length cartoon, "Pongo and Perdita," saw its local preem at Astor which, as per an old tradition, always has Disney production over the Xmas holidays. Film got good reviews. Universal's "Come September" was generally registered a very stout entertainment picture. "King of Kings," which saw its German preem at the MGM Theatre, garnered so-so reviews. It has to be added, however, that biblical films have never done well with the local crix.

Of the five new German pix, Ladislao Vajda's "The Liar," walked off with best review. It looks to be one of the best German features of the year.

'Breakfast' to Be Shown On New French Liner

Paris, Jan. 2.

"Breakfast at Tiffany's (Par) has been chosen to be shown during the benefit ball, Le Bal Des Petit Lits Blancs. Affair unfolds Saturday (13) on the new French luxury liner France while in harbor.

Audrey Hepburn and Mel Ferrer will show along with a who's who socialite, political and show biz crowd. Paramount's Continental Manager John Nathan will also look in on the shindig.

W. Germany to Maintain $25,000 Maximum On All Film Star Salaries

Frankfurt, Dec. 26.

The unpopular salary scale, which limits a top German star to a maximum salary of $25,000 for a role in a film, is going to be maintained. The chiefs of the West German distributors and producers, who just held a joint meeting, have decided to maintain the salary schedule, even though the stars claim that it led to many abuses.

In view of the growing costs of film productions, and the worldwide drop in boxoffice receipts, the producers and distributors point out that only by limiting salaries can they bring in films at a reasonable cost.

The stars, on the other hand, charge that the salary scales, which have become known to the public, take the glamor and appeal away from the celebrities, and handicap them in earning a fair return from their work.

Some of the German stars have refused to work in German films at these set salaries. Austrian actor Karl-Heinz Boehm recently commented that he would never again work for a German producer at his peg on the scale, which is in the $10,000 category. He also noted that some producers who want a certain star for a part are sidestepping the agreement by paying the star off with an expensive gift or some added fee under the table.

And German star Curd Jurgens recently formed his own production company to avoid being trapped at the $25,000 fee for his talent. Others, like Maria Schell and Horst Buchholz, are filming for American and British producers, where they are paid many times what they would earn in a German pic.

Everything's Peachy in Georgia

Atlanta, Jan. 2.

Georgia economics are booming. State's total employment by 1970 will have increased by some 264,000 nonfarm jobs over that of 1960, while the state's business activity will be up 75% and the average per capita income will have risen $750 to a plateau of $2,371.

Financial forecast was included in an analysis of Georgia's economic picture released by Ben T. Huiet, Georgia's Commissioner of Labor.

And, of course, what's good for Georgia's industry means more money in the jeans of individuals to buy theatre tickets, patronize clubs and gay spots, bistros, niteries and danceries and other places where amusements and food and drink are purveyed and dispensed.

John L. Fulmer, professor with the School of Industrial Management at Georgia Institute of Technology, estimates that, based on the 1947-1960 figures, total income in the state (in current dollars) is expected to reach $11-billion by 1970, compared with some six in 1960. Retail sales by that time will have reached a level of $7,100,000,000 (b), up from $4,000,000,000 (b) in 1960.

There will be something of a population explosion, too. Dr. Fulmer opines, an increase of 703,000 over 1960 to a total of 4,658,000 in 1970, while migration loss is expected to amount to no more than 10 per cent of natural population gain. (Atlanta Metropolitan Area topped million population two years ago.)

He said that the "most serious problem which may handicap the Georgia economy during the 1960s are:

Scarcity of skilled workers.

Inadequacy of the state's highway system.

A lack of centralized state planning and development.

Report From Minnesota

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Last summer's drouth "continues to be the No. 1 factor affecting this predominatingly agriculture area's economy adversely," according to the current Minneapolis Federal Reserve bank report. But films theatres do not seem to be suffering.

Even during this pre-Christmas period—a period which normally brings on boxoffice declines—there are more excellent grosses in evidence than at any corresponding time in many years. And these grosses continue to hold up remarkably well.

It just goes to demonstrate what can be accomplished when the quality of releases averages high, as it does now, points out M. A. Levy, 20th-Fox branch manager here. All companies are coming through in almost record-breaking fashion with strong boxoffice pictures, he feels.

"Regardless of how many adverse factors there may be, it's proved again that if you give the public good pictures, as they're being given now, it'll find the means and inclination to respond at the boxoffice."

Nat'l & Fan Mags Unpredictable

articles. Neither the p. a. nor the star liked the story that finally appeared; the star called the p. a., and said, "Look, I'll keep paying you. But don't ask me to do any more interviews. Who needs stories like this one?"

On the other hand, Look ran a very soft interpretation of the idiosyncracies of Doris Day. Even her failure to perform for charitable functions was glossed over, and attributed to her shyness, and divine law and order.

If the national magazines puzzle pressagents, the four periodicals puzzle them even more. Several of the biggest have changed their policies this year. Stars and ballyhooers carrying ancient grudges against Modern Screen discovered, by reading latest issues and talking to Jean Ramer and Helen Weller, that the magazine is now upbeat, that it will be varied in content, and carry "exciting but never misleading" headlines. Miss Ramer believes that titles of stories should have a direct relationship to text—a principle that in the past has been violated by many magazines—national mags as well as fan books.

On the other hand, some magazines that have been consistently constructive in the past are running bolder stories and headlines today.

Photoplay, in the past one of the most conservative of the fan mags and one of the most constructive, now runs such coverlines as "Did Jackie Kennedy Give the Order: 'Drop Sinatra!'" and "The Night They Tried to Murder Eddie Fisher."

Publicity operators can no longer rest secure in the knowledge that because a magazine has been kind to clients in the past, it will continue to be; nor can they go on the premise that the magazines they and their clients learned to hate are still hateable.

Never before has it been so important for press agents to know what current policy, right this minute, is. They are more dependent than ever before on honest editors and honest writers.

Probably the reason for all the shifting of magazine images is that with printing and other costs so high, it's harder than ever to keep a magazine successful. Faced by a brutal struggle for circulation, magazines that have played ball with stars in the past are sometimes tempted to get out of line. They look upon sensational titles as their only hope of survival.

But the magazines that have tried sensationalism know how suicidal this policy is: leading to loss of advertising, threats of libel suits, and actual libel suits.

When their business managers count the cost of fighting libel suits against possible circulation gains through deceitful coverlines, there is finally only one choice: if they cannot survive without libel, they cannot survive period.

That is why, in the long run, only those magazines that get their scoops without libelous text and titles will live. The other mags will have to reform or die.

said with enthusiasm, "I will be glad to make American films. I am very happy working with Americans. I was only unhappy working with Mr. Zanuck. That's why I left."

During the four years of her association with Zanuck, Miss Greco made "Roots of Heaven," "Naked Earth," "Crack in the Mirror" and "The Big Gamble."

Miss Greco said in measured words, "Mr. Zanuck told the English press something extremely shocking to me which was printed by everybody. He told them he tried very hard, but couldn't make a star out of me.

"It's extremely unfair for this reason," Miss Greco continued. "If I look at all the reviews for these films, they are all against Mr. Zanuck and they ask why he did that to me. I am not responsible for the production. I am not responsible for the script. I really want to say this. I don't see why he had to do that." As to roles she would prefer, Miss Greco considered. "It's very difficult for me to make any choice. I have a very good French accent. My French accent is perfect," she laughed.

Actress will return to the U. S. this fall. Six years ago she sang at the Waldorf. She mentioned possibly playing Broadway's Golden Theatre, until recently Alex Cohen's stand.

Miss Greco is undecided if she will carry the entire show or only appear in the second half of the program. "I wouldn't like to be boring," she submitted.

Projection Complaint

Washington.

Editor, VARIETY:

While visiting Washington, D. C. I went to the DuPont Theatre there to see "One, Two, Three." Although I enjoyed the film very much I would like to bring one thing to your attention. This film was advertised in the papers and on the displays in front of the theatre as "Filmed in Panavision."

The DuPont Theatre has a square screen that would have been considered small in 1930. A good 40% of the picture was chopped off on both ends, and it seemed as though Cagney alone was kept in focus regardless of who was speaking at the moment. Much of the humor of the film was lost because of this. For instance, there is a scene where a maid is given a fur coat as a gift. We hear this alluded to, but the maid and the coat are not actually seen until long after.

Fine is president, now serving second consecutive term, of Allied States Assn. He's associated in exhibition with M.S. Fine and Leroy Kendis.

Cinerama's 100

where five Cinerama travel pix were exhibited in deals for "How" or "Brothers Grimm," both of which are on last production lap at MGM's Culver City studio.

All deals with exhibs are on 90-10 basis. Only in Europe is Cinerama making four-wall deals. This obtains for Brussels where first European Super preemed Dec. 21. House seats 1,200 and is operated by Cinerama.

Second opening will be completely remodeled Empire, Paris, on Jan. 19, seating 1175. "Windjammer," just acquired by Cinerama, will be maiden attraction. Belgium house debuted with "This Is Cinerama" and will follow with other four Lowell Thomas subjects.

Angle on exhib preference in new Super Cineramas, according to triple screen topper, is he prefers working with theatre owners rather than against them.

Also, he figures, it's their biz and they should invest in new undertakings, particularly when a revolutionary process like Cinerama comes along. Each theatre can play it for a year or more, to say the least, to insure their fiscal outlay, in his estimation.

Firstruns Top 1959 But Not 1960, Analysis of Los Angeles Reveals

By WHITNEY WILLIAMS

Los Angeles, Jan. 2.

Los Angeles firstruns piled up a fine $10,431,221 for the calendar year 1961. With considerably fewer openers, however, tally repped a 5% dip below 1960's $10,980,744, but still 4.04% over '59's $10,070,212.

Statistically, the '59 tally was 9.8% under 1958's $11,164,455, which in turn was 3.2% below 1957's $11,534,700. Year 1956's great $11,918,400 repped the highest take since 1949's colossal $13,596,400, down from 1948's record $14,686,800.

Strong entries were responsible for first quarter of 1961 topping all others by a substantial margin—$3,122,774 against third period's $2,673,948, nearest contender, and the fourth's $2,303,500, weakest of the year through the absence of any outstanding product strength. Second quarter for '61 was $2,330,999. Comparative figures for '60 showed third quarter the highest, $2,924,994, as compared to second strongest first quarter's $2,872,984. Second and fourth quarters for '60 hit $2,540,840 and $2,641,926, respectively.

As a matter of statistical interest, '61's first quarter was first 13-week period to top $3,000,000 since 1958's first quarter's $3,127,194, a mere $5,420 better. With that exception, '61's first repped the highest firstrun quarter take since 1957's third $3,364,200.

In further compilation of quarterly totals, 1959's first led that year, $2,863,908, followed by $2,287,670, $2,638,560 and $2,280,075, respectively. In 1958, first quarter also was tops, $3,127,194; then, $2,597,109, $3,050,945 and $2,387,207, respectively. For 1957, third period led the year, $3,304,200, and first, second and fourth quarters, respectively, tallied $2,655,000, $2,681,200 and $2,884,700.

Where the year 1960 saw 237 new bills and 49 reissues, the greatest number of openers in many years, 1961 opened only 194 new bills and 46 re-releases, lowest total in years. A total of 213 new bills and 44 reissues played in 1959; 232 new and 43 reissues in 1958; and 256 new and 36 reissues in 1957.

"Ben-Hur" continued to lead the town in total take during 1961 at the Egyptian, as it did the previous year. For its carry-over into 1961 for 43 weeks, both at the Egyptian and then in general release, film grossed $762,816, up over its closest contender, "Spartacus," which did $652,722 in 51 weeks at Pantages, also carried over from 1959.

"Exodus," held over from 1960, came in third in year's sweepstakes, running up $545,914 for 32½ weeks.

Two highest grossers for 1960 were "Ben-Hur," $1,427,116 for 52 weeks, and "Search for Paradise," $674,366 for 38 weeks at Warner Hollywood, where it also held over from previous year.

Remaining top grossers of 1961 were: "Pepe," $391,321 for 25 weeks; "Never On Sunday," $325,520, 46 weeks; "La Dolce Vita," $315,709, 24 weeks at Music Hall, where it's held over into 1962. Seventh pic was "Guns of Navarone," $295,230, 13 weeks; "The Alamo," $263,887, 16 weeks; "World of Suzie Wong," $238,645, 14 weeks; and "The Absent-Minded Professor," $229,344, 12 weeks.

Totals for 1961 were based upon an average of 26½ houses, fractionally down from '60's 27-theatre average, up from '59's 26 average and under 1958's 28-house average.

Nuns' Popcorn Klatch

Detroit, Jan. 2.

Some 750 Roman Catholic nuns were guests of managers of three Catholic credit unions at a special matinee showing of "The Parent Trap" at the Woods, nabe United Detroit theatre. The nuns consumed about $600 worth of free popcorn, candy bars, icecream bars and soda pop.

It was the first time some of the nuns had seen a feature filmed in color. The party was such a success it will become an annual event.

Adelman's 1948 Action Defeated

Dallas, Jan. 2.

A decision handed down Dec. 8, 1961, by the U. S. Court of Appeals in New Orleans upheld the judgment of the lower U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Texas, which had ruled that exhibitor I. B. Adelman's Delman Theatre in Houston was not in competition for equal run with Loew's State, Metropolitan or Majestic Theatre in that city. The judgment of the District Court was affirmed by Chief Judge Tuttle and Circuit Judges Hutcheson and Jones.

The suit was originated in 1948 by I. B. Adelman, seeking an injunction against Paramount Pictures, et al, to allow him to compete for first run availability with the specifically designated theatres of Loew's State and AB-PT affiliate Interstate's Majestic and Metropolitan, all downtown operations.

Adelman's claim that he was entitled to compete with all theatres in Houston was denied in September, 1955, by the District Court, which determined that he was not in competition with the three aforementioned downtown theatres, but conceded that he was in competitive status with defendant Kirby and River Oaks theatres. There was no appeal from the judgment.

Again in 1958 Adelman filed a petition for modification of the injunction by giving him an opportunity to compete with the same downtown first-run theatres. This time the District Court dismissed the petition, concluding that the principles of estoppel and res adjudicata were controlling factors against the complaintant.

Judge Jones' summation read, "Since it was expressly decided on the original application for an injunction that the appellant's Delman Theatre was not in competition with appellees' Loew's State, Metropolitan and Majestic Theatres, and no subsequently occurring fact is asserted as establishing the contrary of that determination, any modification of the injunction such as is sought would be a reversal of the determination of an isue decided by the court and acepted by the Appellant."

Expansive Showmen of Orient

Native film activity in the Orient continues to boom. Although Occidental attention centres on the big Tokyo studios, the upbeat encompasses much of the Far East, and is accented by a $3,500,000 production layout being built on the Hong Kong periphery by the Shaw Brothers, who operate the largest production-exhibitor combine in the Far East.

Actually, the project shapes as a major land development scheme. Besides the six-stage studio, a pair of 150-unit apartment buildings, two restaurants and a dispensary are also blueprinted. (It may be footnoted that in the current initial construction phase, some 300 women are gouging out a hillside because the law forbids dynamiting in the area.)

The Shaw freres (Run Run and Runme) own 200 theatres in Hong Kong, Singapore and throughout Malaya and Borneo. Five of the 11 firstruns in Hong Kong are theirs. For some years, they've operated a downtown Hong Kong studio grinding out quickie product at a rate of about 50 annually. They also shoot 12 per annum in Kuala Lumpur and Singapore, respectively. All pix are in Chinese and strictly for pop patronage in the Far East. Few have ever been circulated outside Asia.

Italy, France Set New Film Pacts With Mex

Mexico City, Jan. 2.

Mexico has signed new and satisfactory film exchange pacts with France, Italy and Germany, the Film Bureau has revealed. Under terms of the agreements, one Mexican picture will be shown for each three French exhibited here. Same ratio applies for Italian and German product.

Only official comment on the new pacts was that Mexico has never had any exhibition problems in Germany since national films are "constantly" shown in West Germany.

Kirkbride in Japan to Research On Film, Not Pleased With Offers

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

While most novelists would be delighted to have had two of their last three works bought for films and the third an object of offers, Ronald Kirkbride has mixed feelings.

The restraint of his joy is based on sound economics. Kirkbride's "Tamiko" was first optioned for six months to indie British producer John Bryan for 100 pounds ($280). When Hal Wallis was urged by Laurence Harvey to buy it as a Paramount vehicle for the actor, Kirkbride was obliged to divide the re-sale fee with Bryan, at the same time he, not the businessmen, was paying for the services of two literary agents.

Another of Kirkbride's recent novels, "An Innocent Abroad," will be lensed here next year by Betty Box for J. Arthur Rank. Three days after that deal was made, the author received an offer of $150,000, tax free, from Paramount. He was, of course, forced to refuse.

Kirkbride's latest work, "The King on the Via Veneto," is due for publication in about a dozen countries this summer. It deals with a tough American in Italy who falls in love with a Communist. Several British offers for the film rights have already been rejected.

"This time I'm going to sit on it and wait for a decent sale to American films," said Kirkbride, nursing his fiscal wounds.

Kirkbride was in Japan—en route to a Hollywood assignment—researching a novel about the pearl industry.

Acknowledging that most of the novels with foreigners placed in the Orient have a sameness, the Canadian-born, American citizen and resident of England offered, "It concerned me, but my agent pointed out that a good story is a good story in any country. I will do a simple story that has nothing to do with the difference between Japanese and foreigners," said the one time Paramount screenwriter. "The pearl industry is here. That's why I'm here."

More Hardtoppers

A new hardtop, which the Skouras circuit will operate, is going up in Oyster Bay, L.I., sponsored by attorney James M. O'Connell. It will be an intime house, with off-street auto parking included in the blueprints.

Another four-waller is being built by Associated Independent Theatres at Newburgh, N.Y., as part of the Mid-Hudson Shopping Plaza there. New situation, an 800-seater, will be 18th link for Associated in the New York area.

Fine to Hi Martin: 'New Wording Removes Fears Of Allied Membership'

Detroit, Jan. 2.

Universal license agreement has been reworded to eliminate any possible interpretation that percentage arrangements include concession receipts, according to a letter from Henry H. Martin, veepee and general sales manager of Universal Pictures, to Marshall H. Fine, prexy of National Allied.

Martin's letter said, in part: "We are interested only in a fair shake, which means having our film rentals fairly computed on gross receipts which truly reflect the returns on our pictures."

In a reply, Fine said, in part: ". . . The clear definition of 'gross receipts' now stated in Cause 2 leaves absolutely no reason for any concern whatsoever . . . We take this action on your part as positive proof of the fact that Universal . . . (is) . . . doing all it can to aid and cooperate with the exhibitor in his problems."

Anglo-French Prod. Of 'Conqueror' Planned

London, Dec. 26.

Lord John Brabourne, together with French producer Ray Ventura, is to film "William the Conqueror." The pic will be directed by Lewis Gilbert, who carried out a similar chore on Brabourne's "Sink the Bismark" and the recently completed "HMS Defiant," costarring Alec Guinness, Dick Bogarde and Anthony Quayle.

The new production will be based on a treatment by Serge de la Roche, and will use a new camera process, details of which will be announced later. It is claimed to be the most expensive production ever to be filmed in Britain. Five countries are said to be involved in the financing.

Woo Legit Subscribers To 'Roman Spring' Pic

Chicago, Jan. 2.

The ad-pub department of Balaban & Katz is latching onto the legit appeal of Warner Bros. "Roman Spring of Mrs. Stone," which is based on Tennessee Williams only novel. Film opened last Friday (29) at the Roosevelt Theatre.

A letter sent to subscribers to legit series in Chi from B&K, said, in part: "As a subscriber to the legitimate theatre of Chicago, you may be surprised to receive a letter about a motion picture. But the very fact that you are discriminating in your entertainment interests prompts this letter." Missive also points out that the picture stars Vivien Leigh, who portrayed Blanche Dubois in the screen version of "A Streetcar Named Desire."

In addition to the straight b.o. pitch, B&K is doubtlessly aiming at lowering highbrow objections to attending the Roosevelt, which to date has primarily been the B&K Loop outlet for exploitation pictures.

Screen version of Williams' "Summer and Smoke" (Par) bowed at the Esquire last Thursday (28), and M-G-M's adaptation of "Sweet Bird of Youth" is set for the Chicago Theatre in late March. Pre-Broadway tryout run of Williams' "Night of the Iguana" closed at the Blackstone Dec. 24.

Debt to Prudential

Cinerama's indebtedness to Prudential Insurance totals $15,490,000, now that a new arrangement for a $6,000,000 loan has been completed, Nicolas Reisini, prexy of triple screen process, clarified before planing to Gotham with attorney Sidney Davis.

In 1959, Reisini explained, Cinerama borrowed $9,000,000, then another $3,000,000 from the insurance firm, the latter deal being made to pay for the purchase of five travel pix produced by Lowell Thomas. All but $490,000 of the $3,000,000 has been accounted for.

This brought the figure to $9,490,000. But with the new $6,000,000 loan, Cinerama now owes the insurance company $15,490,000. Payments are being made from net profits, 75% to Prudential, balance for tri-screen outfit's operations.

tractual commitments as yet. Cinerama outlets in the States will be up to 60, from the present 29, by next July 4, and the units overseas will hit 40 by next October, from the present 17.

Among those investing in new Cinerama (and Super-Cinerama), theatres are Lockwood & Gordon in San Diego, National Theatres & Television in Los Angeles, E. D. Martin in New Orleans, Julius Gordon in Houston and Cooper Foundation Theatres in Minneapolis, all at their own expense and according to Cinerama specifications. Cooper put up the first, eight miles away from downtown Denver. Bernard Kranze, Cinerama theatre operations v.p., reported that this house grossed a remarkable weekly average of $13,000 over the 33-week run of the nine-year-old "This Is Cinerama." He added that the follow-up pic, "Seven Wonders of the World," was in the six-week mark and averaging $15,000 weekly.

Zanuck's Pic

rights, or lack of them, accorded servicemen.

The gripes received by Ervin came from American personnel stationed at Rochuefort, France, near La Rochelle and the Ile de Re where Zanuck shot the last big battle scenes in November. According to Subcommittee sources, the troops were logistics or quartermaster specialists. None came from the 250 front-line infantry detachment from Germany to give Zanuck a hand (the number had been cut from the original request of 700 by direct order from McNamara to Gen. Loris Norstad, NATO commander, who wanted to give Zanuck the full complement). The use of the Rochufort troops by Zanuck had not been disclosed here before, and raises the question of whether Zanuck used more than 250 GI's at La Rochelle. The Army, said in a statement following Ervin's letter that as far as it knew, all the troops at Zanuck's disposal were from Germany.

Ervin said that the complaining soldiers, reported to be about half a dozen, had been "threatened with unpleasant consequences if they did not participate in Zanuck's epic of D-Day."

Teeing off on the constitutional rights angle, the North Carolina Senator averred: "The Constitution gives Congress the power the raise armies for the defense of the U. S.—not for participation in private commercial ventures. Should commanding officers try to compel military personnel, against their will, to engage in an enterprise, such as a movie extravaganza, for the primary benefit of a private citizen, a situation would be created which resembles very closely unconstitutional involuntary servitude.

"Of course, I have no objection to participation by military personnel in reenacting one of the great events in American history—even if a private citizens should benefit—providing such activity by servicemen is voluntary. However, I think that it exceeds the constitutional authority of the military to compel a serviceman to do so."

'61 Mex Pix Biz to New Low

America, its traditional market. As an example, Brazilian currency was quoted 33 to the dollar eight years ago and today the rate is above 290. Chile's peso then 60 to the dollar is now 1,050 per $1, and so on. Added to this, in Cuba and Venezuela boxoffice funds have been frozen. Under this situation, Peliculas Mexicanas, the official distributorship handling Mexican product in these areas, has suffered to point where it had to forego financing its share of new production.

Other Woes Hit Film Industry

But financial woes are not the only reason for the slump. There have been gaps in national distribution, and the recent development which imposed a 60-40 ratio, favoring national product over Hollywood and foreign, has not resolved the problem because of the admitted "mediocre" quality of far too much of native fare.

Jorge Ferretis, Film Bureau head, who wishes to gradually eliminate preponderance of two-week churros (quickies) with higher level fare, has repeatedly said that "today's film industry crisis is fundamentally based on the quality of our production and an inadequate distribution in Spanish speaking areas." There is truth in Ferretis' words, for majority of Mexican producers have bypassed the need to turn out better pictures for a public becoming increasingly culture conscious. The time for making badly put together singing cowboy westerns, so-so melers and carbon copies of Hollywood product is over. And serious voices in the industry, not only Ferretis and other federal officials, have been harping on this theme for years.

Exhibitors, of course, show a preference for Hollywood and foreign product, champ at federal restrictions which have been put into effect to move canned national product into the theatres. While producers now cannot complain of heavy reserves of canned films, neither they nor exhibitors are happy. The sad truth is that the Mexican public, with exception of non-demanding rural audiences, generally snub local productions.

Based on conservative overall figures from industry sources, Mexico does have 1,438 bonafide film theatres, 115 of these located in this capital city.

328 Films Screened

Final figures for the year on actual exhibition are unavailable as yet, but by last November, 328 pictures had been screened. Breakdown shows that Hollywood accounted for 124 of these, Mexico was next with 91, and balance spread around various foreign productions.

Ferretis and heads of official distributorships state that the Mexican market can easily absorb 100 nationally made films annually. And Film Bureau and Film Bank policy appears to be aligned to give stimulus to the industry to attain this level again. This main reason why independent exhibitors obtained an official okay last year to turn out 30 films in 14 months.

Solution Right At Home

Feeling of top officials is that resolution of Mexico's industry problems must be sought within the borders of the Republic. Federico Heuer, recently ailing Film Bank head, now back at his desk, said the industry must not look longingly at foreign markets. "The solution must be an internal one," he said, "with the object being to leave the door open for export of selected pictures in open competition with such important industries as those of Italy and France, for example."

Heuer admitted that there is a need for more money, as well as boosting of quality standards. Indications are that the federal government will provide the money if producers provide better scripts.

Going back to 1932, when the Mexican picture industry was born, there have been approximately 1,700 films made. Of this total, and stretching the point widely, there have been perhaps 170 good films or 10%. And of really excellent pictures, there are only a mere half dozen including "Pueblerina," "Maria Candelaria," "La Red" (The Net) and the most recent "Macario" and "The Important Man."

Indicators point that an adaptation of the subsidy plan may be initiated on a merit basis, for producers who do swing from stereotyped production to better pictures. And serious producers such as Oscar Brooks, Gregorio Wallerstein, Ismael Rodriguez and a handful of others are probing the feasibility of collaboration in internal coproductions: the pooling of resources and cash by two, three or more producers to turn out pictures which can stand on merits in international competition.

Ferretis and Heuer have often said that there would be a major improvement if producers used their own cash, or obtained it from investors, instead of relying on government funds. This latter policy has been an easy way of making money since Film Bank regulations permit a producer's fee which averages around $2,000 per picture. Good or bad, a producer had this as "money in the bank," and many just did not care to take the initiative or "gamble" on quality productions that might or might not make them fabulous profits.

Twin federal drive appears to be something like this: a still further boost in exhibition time for Mexican product in the nation's theatres and an increase in boxoffice. This latter to be on a republic-wide basis.

On one point all segments, industry and official, are agreed. Despite the problems affecting the industry and still requiring resolution, pictures are a part of Mexican life and the government will not permit the bankruptcy of an activity which affords entertainment for its citizens and which, apart from recurrent blunders, has been a steadily increasing international impact.

French Filmite

At least with production costs today, it would have been just too exorbitant.

So "Ben-Hur" (M-G), "Guns of Navarone" (Col), "Cid," "King of Kings" (M-G) and even comedies or dramas with European backgrounds do get an added plus via on-the-spot production. And Yank films remain American no matter where they are made, he says.

With foreign income now so important to American companies, he feels it is only common sense to also make films abroad.

Scanning a list of recent top grossers, he pointed to some of the top pix in 1961 which were all American and all made abroad, namely "Ben-Hur," "Guns of Navarone," and "Goodbye Again" (UA). "Exodus" (UA) also was high on the list. He sums up that American production abroad is not runaway but a definite, understandable development because of film conditions today.

of Windsor." The sketch revue, "Un Certain M. Blot," is mainly beholden to Michel Serrault's canny portrayal of the French little man. Francois Perier's stylish comedics have been the main plus factor in the threeyear run of "Gog and Magog."

The French, who usually go more for the playwright than the star, now seem to be demanding star-tailored qualities for their legit preferences. The long run of Jerome Kilty's "Dear Liar" also was attributed mainly to the vehicle it offered for thesps Pierre Brasseur and Maria Casares.

U Pfd. De-Lists Jan. 12

Washington, Jan. 2.

Securities & Exchange Commission has bowed to request of New York Stock Exchange and delisted the common and 4½% preferred stock of Universal Pictures.

Effective date of the delisting was set at close of trading session Jan. 12. Reason given for the move: limited distribution of shares, mostly self-held, and small interest displayed by the public in the securities.

Recent VARIETY survey of Denver cinemas erratumed in stating the town was without a single indie theatre. There is one, in fact, but the further distinction of the 700-seat Webber in the "Miracle Mile" mercantile district is that it's staffed predominantly by femmes, headed by owner-booker Mrs. Gertrude Bailey. She took over the subrun-moveover situation in '58 upon death of her husband, Thomas, who had spent 20 years in the local Film Row with various major distribs.

Except for projectionist and two college lads (to service the marquee and related chores), Webber is a distaff operation, including house manager Evelyn Titles. Theatre is attuned to family trade.

ELECTRICAL SHORTAGE CURBS FILM GROWTH

Bombay, Jan. 2.

Bombay film and industrial suburb of Chembur has new theatre called Nataraj Talkies under way. It will seat total of 896. Five more theatres for city are under blueprint, but progress is held up for want of necessary cement and electricity.

Bombay government, because of shortage of power, has banned holding of shows before 12 noon on weekdays. Exhibitor body is trying to get exemption for theatres which hold mode than three shows daily and also for permission to hold morning shows on bank and religious holidays falling on weekdays.

Cinerama Tracks Using Local Lingo

Cinerama pictures are to be dubbed into the native-language of each country they play, Nicholas Reisini, president-chairman of the Cinerama organization, disclosed in New York last week. There are to be no sub-titles, he emphasized.

Even prints of the Cinerama productions playing in the British Isles are to be dubbed because, as Reisini states, the Englanders don't like the American accent.

Denton, Tex., Demo

Denton, Tex., Jan. 2.

A group of about 40 students of North Texas State recently staged the four stand-in demonstrations at the Campus Theatre in Downtown Denton within a week.

The group of white and Negro students sought admission to the theatre for the Negroes. They stood in line outside the theatre for about an hour singing songs, chanting "pray for freedom," and passing out tickets bearing the inscription, "I believe in racial equality."

Another group of male NTSU students across the street from the theatre stood there singing "Dixie" and touting Jim Crow.

Two local policemen were in the theatre along with the theatre manager J. F. Harrison and Pat Hudgins of Dallas, assistant to the division manager for Interstate Theatres.

Denton police chief I. E. Anderson and city manager Homer Bly observed the demonstration from a police car nearby.

Think Hard-Ducat Films Go Too Fast Into Subsequent Playoff

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Some of the film company branch managers here believe that roadshow pictures and the theatre where they have their local hardticket firstruns are being hurt plenty at the boxoffice because of home office policy to release them to neighborhood houses here for non-roadshow engagements "far too soon" after the end of their loop runs.

In the neighborhood houses where they go 30 days after finishing downtown, instead of getting a second loop run, these roadshow pictures are shown for much lower admissions than the loop $2.65 hardticket top. The difference in admission savings in the instance of these hardticket pictures is much greater than in the case of regular films, it's pointed out. It pays considerably for people to wait to see them and many undoubtedly do, say the objectors to the policy.

The Twin Cities with their population of more than a million, including suburbs, have had and now have only one theatre, Ted Mann's Academy in Minneapolis, that plays the hardticket pictures, although United Paramount circuit has two downtown firstrun theatres here and the same number in St. Paul, and Bennie Berger and Cinerama one each locally and Harold Field two in Minneapolis uptown where roadshow engagements would fit in.

This adverse view anent the way roadshow pictures are released here for subsequent runs is directly contrary to the position taken by Allied States which has been attacking the film companies because that organization claims such hardticket attractions don't reach the lesser theatres for non-roadshow runs soon enough.

And while there's this present outbreak here by part of the industry anent the release policy for roadshow pictures, Mann has no intention to change his policy of hardticket pictures exclusively at the Academy. Moreover, while the public knows that only a short wait is involved to see the roadshow features at much lower admission, these pictures have played to what impress industry outsiders as smash grosses, even if not so large as they might have been if the public couldn't see them for less soon after the loop firstruns' end.

Mann, who has four of the eight leading firstrun houses in downtown Minneapolis and three of the five in St. Paul, declined to make any statement or comment when asked if he thinks his Academy is being hurt by the way roadshow pictures are being released for subsequent runs. It's being pointed out how Cinerama's Century Theatre here in its newspaper and other ads emphasizes that its pictures never will be shown elsewhere in this territory ever. There is no other Cinerama house within a distance of hundreds of miles.

Also, despite the manner in which the Academy apparently is being damaged at the boxoffice, it's known that Cinerama's Century here and Harold Field for his St. Louis Park local neighborhood theatre bid unsuccessfully against Mann for several roadshow pictures.

All of the roadshow pictures have been going, and still are, to the Academy. It's the most beautiful and best located of all the Twin Cities theatres and the hardticket engagements there are exclusive both for Minneapolis and St. Paul. The latter city, in fact, gets no hardticket film attractions. Another reason for the Academy grabbing off all of the roadshow offerings is the fact that Mann gives them such terrific and expensive advertising and exploitation campaigns.

Sam Bronston's "King of Kings" now is in its eighth good week at the Academy where the next hardticket attraction will be same producer's "El Cid." The other hardticket attractions that were shown at the Academy and ran from 15 to 50 weeks—most to what even the critics of the present release policy concede to have been big grosses—are "Ben-Hur," "South Pacific," "Around the World in 80 Days," "Porgy and Bess," "The Big Fisherman," "La Dolce Vita," and "Spartacus." It would have been better for the film companies if several of these had been released here regularly instead of hardticket offerings, industry circles feel. And most of them gave the neighborhood houses record-breaking grosses and ran as long as two weeks at such theatres when released uptown subsequently to their loop initial runs. The fanfare they got at the Academy helped the neighborhood houses immeasurably, trade circles feel.

Chile Bans 'Kings' For Youngsters Under 14

Santiago, Jan. 2.

"King of Kings" (M-G) originally was scheduled to open at Santiago's Metro Theatre on Dec. 20. But because of censorship trouble, it had to be postponed until Dec. 27. The Chilean Censorship Board's main function is to classify pic.

"Kings" was first viewed by four censors Dec. 12. Viewed again on Dec. 18 by all six censors, it was decided to place the pic in the "over 14" category. Only kids over 14 may see the pic here. John O'Brien, manager of Metro in Chile said that the elimination of children under 14 will mean a drop of about 20% in boxoffice receipts.

JIM BISHOP ON 'ADULT' FILMS

"Tonight, I propose to talk about sex in motion pictures. In this case, the word has an unholy connotation. Hollywood is desperate for business and, in its desperation, has been using stories with shock value. There was a time when a big studio could pay the overhead on Andy Hardy pictures, but that time is past. This is the day of the psychopath, the sex deviationist, the girl who says yes almost before the picture starts. It is a time of sadism and homicide, of the switchblade knife and the mentally disturbed student, a time when motion pictures no longer entertain. They stun, they shock, they bruise the soul.

"I am neither a reformer nor a censor. I am unalterably opposed to both. If anything, I am a movie fan. As such, I would like to see Hollywood return to the field of entertainment, and leave psychology and sick sex to the psychiatrists.

"Modern Screen magazine had a sick quotation from movie director Billy Wilder: 'With the present trend continuing, he said, I think the day will come when there will be a movie concerning a boy who falls desperately in love with his mother. The boy learns later that he is adopted. So, heartbroken, he kills himself.'

"Very funny.

"Sex is either beautiful or ugly; it knows nothing between those extremes. Have you noticed the advertisements for movies lately? They pander the most brutal instincts; they no longer stress the story value nor the author and sometimes, not even the stars. The wildest adjectives are set around a half-dressed girl with considerate innuendo about what happens to her in the movie.

"Moralists and clergymen have been pointing an indicting finger at movies since the days of John Bunny and D. W. Griffith. They represent the critical thinking of those who would be shocked at the sight of an infant's bottom. They think nudity, of itself, is indecent. Deliver me from these two because, in my opinion, they are as sick as the script writers who know nothing except violence and sadism. Count me as being somewhere between the two extremes.

"Still, it must be said that the movie industry has gone too far in the opposite direction. It grinds out something called adult films which is nothing more than a group of actors in supporting roles to a bed. Some of them are so adult that the theatres should hang signs over the box office: No one under 70 admitted.

"The answer to the problem of sex in the movies is not censorship, nor boycott, nor the elimination of sex, nor even preaching such as I am doing. The answer lies in a simple blue pencil in the hands of a producer. He's the boss. He knows what is adult and he knows what is plain dirty."

BRAZIL PLEASES ITALY

Picks Two of Its Releases as Year's 'Bests'

Rome, Jan. 2.

Italian press gave much space to news from Rio de Janeiro that Brazilian film critics named two Italian films as the best in a list of the ten outstanding foreign films presented in Rio theatres during 1961.

Leading was Titanus' "Rocco and His Brothers," directed by Luchino Visconti, second place going to Michelangelo Antonioni's "The Adventure."

Others following in the top-ten list are "In Full Sun" by Rene Clement (France); "Studs Lonigan" by Irving Lerner (USA); "Never On Sunday" by Jules Dassin (Greece); "To the Last Breath" by Jean Luc Godard (France); "Handsome Antonio" by Mauro Bolognini (Italy); "The Hoi" by Jacques Becker (France); "Psycho" by Alfred Hitchcock (USA); and "Kanal" by Andrzej Wajda (Poland).

December Rule, Slow-Turning-Big; 'Kings' Again Monthly B.O. Leader; 'Story' Cops Second, 'Bachelor' 3d

By MIKE WEAR

VARIETY's regular weekly boxoffice reports are summarized each month, retrospectively. Based on an average of 24 key situations, the source data constitute an adequate sampling of current releases but are not, of course, fully "definitive." An index of relative grossing strength in the U.S.-Canada market this monthly reprise does not pretend to express total rentals.

Although the tag-end of December as usual, witnessed a sharp upbeat at the boxoffice or as soon as the Christmas holiday week started, earlier portion of month saw exhibitors merely coasting along with overly-extended long-runs, weaker screen fare or re-issues. And it was the same story in every key city by VARIETY. Nothing could overcome the Christmas shopping distraction. Little of the fresh, stronger product was launched in time to contest for laurels in December, most of the top grossers being carry-overs from November.

"King of Kings" (M-G) again finished No. 1, the same as in November, being about $300,000 ahead of its nearest competitor. Second position was copped by "West Side Story" (UA) although out in release only three weeks to any extent and making its amazing showing mainly from playdates in four key cities.

"Bachelor in Paradise" (M-G), which was fifth in November, copped third place. It was closely followed by "Comancheros" (20th), in fourth spot. Pic was fourth also in November. "Hawaii Blues" (Par) finished fifth.

"Breakfast at Tiffany's," also from Paramount, wound up sixth. This comedy, which was second in November, was champion in October. "Susan Slade" (WB) captured seventh position. It was eighth in November.

"Mysterious Island" (Col), a newcomer, did well enough in two weeks to land eighth position. "Errand Boy" (Par), another newie, copped ninth position while "La Dolce Vita" (Astor) rounds out the Top 10 pix.

"Wonders of Aladdin" (M-G), a spotty newcomer; "Splendor in Grass" (WB), sixth in November; and "Devil at 4 O'Clock" (Col), third in November and fourth in October, were the runner-up films in that order. None was particularly strong in December.

Several new pictures, launched late in the month, show excellent promise. "Flower Drum Song" (U), which played previously for five weeks at the N.Y. Music Hall, and "Babes in Toyland" (BV) indicated high promise. Latter, now at the Hall, and "Song" ran neck-n-neck for top honors the final week of December.

"Judgment at Nuremberg" (UA) should hit the b.o. bullseye judging from its capacity initial week at the N.Y. Palace. It is playing hardticket as is "El Cid" (AA), which did well enough the first week out on release to cop fifth place in VARIETY's weekly survey the final December stanza.

"One, Two, Three" (UA), another newcomer, made such a strong showing the final week last month that it finished sixth although playing in only four keys. "Pocketful of Miracles," also from United Artists, was seventh the same week, the initial one out in distribution.

"Lover Come Back" (U), another newie, was rated fancy on its preem date in L.A. "Children's Hour" (UA) was smart in same key city. "The Innocents" (20th) started smash in L.A. while "Second Time Around," from same company, was sock in Denver and nice in N.Y. at the Paramount. "Hey, Let's Twist" (Par) was uneven its first week out in circulation but managed to win runner-up classification.

"Twist Around Clock" (Col), another Twist pic which did fairly well the first week out, was mostly fair to sad the final round in December. "Summer and Smoke" (Par) is credited with doing nicely in two cities.

"Back Street" (U), long high on the weekly lists, finished ninth one session last month, final week out extensively in bigger key cities firstrun. "White Christmas" (Par), one of the few reissues to do much in December, fared well enough to wind up 10th one stanza. "The Mark" (Cont) did well enough to become a runner-up pic another week.

Best in December

1. "King of Kings" (M-G).
2. "West Side Story" (UA).
3. "Bachelor Paradise" (M-G).
4. "Comancheros" (20th).
5. "Hawaii Blues" (Par).
6. "Breakfast Tiffany's" (Par).
7. "Susan Slade" (WB).
8. "Mysterious Island" (Col).
9. "Errand Boy" (Par).
10. "La Dolce Vita" (Astor).

Films Bad, TV Homicidal And Women Disgraceful To Baptist Clergyman

Memphis, Jan. 2.

Rev. Paul Caudill, pastor of the First Baptist Church here and longtime film "censor booster," used his pulpit again to excoriate theatre screen adding a further barrage against tv where he charged "the slaughtering was out of hand by producers and promoters using the home to make a fast dollar." Caudill also chided women during his sermon. "It is disgraceful the way some of our women dress outside of the home, tight-skinned shorts and slacks are disgusting," he stated.

In his sermon Caudill revealed that Judaeo-Christian Council for Democracy, his baby, had asked the distributors for the right to preview films and this had been "denied them," he strongly emphasized. He said the Council had hoped to "grade" films so that moviegoers would know what to expect. He told his flock that this arrangement was provided by a recent Supreme Court decision recognizing the right of municipalities to preview." Caudill stated that "this was not censorship."

Boston, Jan. 2.

Cinema Lodge of B'nai B'rith will sponsor the New England preem of "Judgment at Nuremberg," to be held at Ben Sack's Saxon Theatre, Feb. 13. William Kumins, chapter president, and branch manager of Warner Bros. here, said a testimonial luncheon will be held the same day in honor of "Judgment" producer Stanley Kramer, who has been chosen by Cinema Lodge for its "Man of the Year" award.

Previous recipients of the Cinema Lodge honor have included Jimmy Durante, Joe E. Levine, Steve Broidy and Herman Rifkin.

Chi Only City Attempting To Classify Films

With the passage of the amendment to the Chicago censorship ordinance, Chicago has become the only city or state in the United States which is attempting to "classify motion pictures by legislation," according to a letter sent last week to the Chicago City Council by the Motion Picture Assn. of America. Letter asks whether "the people in Chicago are so in need of controls that their fellow Americans in the 50 states feel are unnecessary?"

In addition to having "grave Constitutional defects," the amendment will not reduce the rate of juvenile crime, says the MPAA. "The crime rate in Washington, D.C., or Philadelphia, was certainly not higher than that of Chicago prior to 1959, when this city was classifying motion pictures." MPAA also predicts the amendment's attempt to redefine "obscenity" for younger people will not survive examination by the courts."

Shopping Center Cartoonery

Amarillo, Tex., Jan. 2.

Suburban Sunset Center shopping mall has what is believed to be the only kind of installation of its kind where motion pictures can be shown without the benefit of darkness.

Roy Friddell of Bi-Fi Inc., has designed and set up a rear projection cartoon theatre in the shopping center. Mothers can check on their children at a glance while on their shopping tour.

BERGER'S OPEN LETTER TOUTING 'POCKETFUL'

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

With "A Pocketful of Miracles" (UA) having suffered a brutally bad boxoffice beating its Christmas opening week at his local loop first-run Gopher Theatre where it nevertheless was held over as required by his deal with its distributor, circuit owner Bennie Berger, the film companies' inveterate foe, took much larger newspaper ads than is usual for house at the film's second stanza's outset.

He did this to personally entreat the public not to miss "A Pocketful of Miracles." He called it "a wonderful, wonderful motion picture."

The ad, run in both of the local daily newspapers, one of which had panned the picture, was labeled an "open letter" from Berger.

Pair Again Sue Zager Co.

Greensboro, N.C., Jan. 2.

An Edgecombe County couple has brought a civil action in Guilford Superior Court against Starlight Theatres Inc. of Greensboro, of which Max Zager is president. R. O. Tarkington and wife, Mary Marsh Tarkington, claim Starlight Theatres owes them $36,120.

Their complaint stated that Zager violated the General Statutes of North Carolina by charging them too much interest on money they paid him for a motion picture theatre in Angier.

A similar action by the Tarkingtons against Starlight Theatres was brought in Harnett Superior Court in 1959, and when the case was transferred to and heard in Guilford Superior Court they took a voluntary nonsuit in the matter.

Exhibs Battling Lottery, Bingo In Michigan

Michigan exhibitor circles, spearheaded by Milton London as prexy of Allied Theatres of Michigan, are putting up a fight to block proposed legalization in that state of bingo and lotteries.

London, together with David Newman, general counsel, have already appeared before the state constitutional convention, which is studying a proposed amendment to greenlight the two games of chance. Lotteries, which the courts have interpreted to include bingo, are presently barred by article five, section 33 of the Michigan constitution.

Principal advocates of the amendment are veterans organizations. Church and civic groups have joined exhibs in opposition to the proposal, basing objections on economic and moral factors.

Toei Fest Windup

Honolulu, Jan. 2.

Toei Film Festival ends today (Tues.) at Consolidated's downtown Princess Theatre. First run showing of "Young Prince and the Playboy" (Wakagimi to Jinanbo) is bolstered by stage show featuring four Toei stars, Kinya Kitaoji, Hiroki Matsukata, Chiyonosuke Azuma and Yoshiko Mita.

Five-day event has had two shows nightly plus three matinees, with house scaled at $1.75 top.

YEAREND WHEELIN' & DEALIN'

The Honeymoon's Over

CBS board chairman Bill Paley has observed more than once that in his own estimation "I Love Lucy" and "The Honeymooners" probably stand as the high water marks in tv comedy. That's why Paley personally initiated overtures recently to reactivate "Honeymooners" as a weekly series, with the original cast of Jackie Gleason, Art Carney and Audrey Meadows.

However the project virtually died a-borning, because (1) Carney was offered the male lead in the "Take Her, She's Mine" current legiter and decided to go thataway, and (2) Gleason decided in favor of remaining in feature films. (He's currently winding up shooting on "Requiem For A Heavyweight.")

NBC's $250,000 Aqua-Carnival Sponsorship at N.Y. Coliseum

The National Broadcasting Co., through NBC Enterprises, is going to finance the first theatrical event ever to be held in New York's Coliseum. The event will also mark the first water show to be held in Manhattan in some 35 years.

Forking out what is reported nearly $250,000, the network is taking over the big floor of the convention site between June 28 and Sept. 3. House will hold 3,500 seats, two portable pools, a full-sized stage "for dry acts," and since NBC and producer John McKnight evidently plans a two show-a-day policy, the Coliseum is going to shun conventions for the hot months this year.

NBC has put money into legit shows (including "How To Succeed Without Really Trying") but reportedly never on this scale. Web figures the show, "Aqua-Carnival," will make an ideal tiein with the city's "N.Y. Is A Summer Festival" theme, besides which there are maybe as many as 3,000,000 sightseers in N.Y. during the summer.

Web is said to have deals in the works already with the town's top tour bookers to throw in the "Aqua-Carnival" as one of the must sights next summer.

McKnight, who produced two summers of the aquacade at Flushing Meadows, has arranged for a 60 by 30-foot pool in which the water spectacles will be staged. He also has another pool, somewhat

3M's $2,000,000 Plunge at ABC-TV

Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing is extending its commitments on the ABC-TV network to well over $2,000,000 during 1962. In addition to renewing its "Ben Casey" participation through the second and third quarters, 3M also picking up the tab for the Bing Crosby Golf Tournament Jan. 20-21.

ABC-TV's daytime schedule was the beneficiary of over $1,000,000 in 3M business for next year. The company has placed a 52-week order for participation in such shows as "Yours For A Song," "Jane Wyman Presents" and "American Bandstand." Sponsorship for 3M's various divisions, including retail tape and Scotchbrite, will be on a consistent weekly schedule augmented by special promotional campaigns.

The agencies for 3M in the ABC-TV deals were MacManus, John & Adams, BBDO and Erwin Wasey, Ruthrauff & Ryan.

Fels and Feenamint's Daytime TV Splurge

Two major radio-advertised products, Fels and Feenamint, are now switching the major part of their campaigns to network television. Fels, a Philadelphia-based soap company, has prepared a $1,000,000 daytime television bow on NBC-TV and ABC-TV through the Richard Manoff Agency.

Feenamint, a Pharmaco product and an historic radio network advertiser, is now shifting the bulk of its coin to daytime television exclusively on ABC-TV via N.W. Ayer.

Chrysler's Berle Spec

"The Milton Berle Show" will be Chrysler Corp.'s third special of the season on NBC-TV, March 9. Color spec with Berle in the host role will feature Jack Benny and film actor Laurence Harvey.

Chrysler earlier did a Bob Hope special and has another coming up on Lerner & Loewe.

Timex Coin Shifts To NBC, Also ABC Montand as Rerun

Timex is buying a hefty share of two Bob Hope specials on NBC-TV and is also going to supply that network with a springtime rerun of the recent Yves Montand special done originally on ABC-TV.

Besides failing to get air rights to the Montand rerun, ABC-TV has reportedly also lost the Timex coin that was to be used for an upcoming Bing Crosby spec.

This sudden windfall means over $750,000 in fresh coin for NBC-TV. It also cues that Revlon is probably still miffed over Hope's appearance in a newspaper ad for rival Arpege and does not intend to sponsor any further Hope shows this season. (The morning after his spec for Revlon, he appeared on the back page of the N.Y. Times plugging Arpege.)

Originally, Revlon (which, incidentally, got a whopping 50-plus share of audience for its Hope special last month) intended to buy a tota' of three or four of the Hope-NBC-TV shows.

It is understood that NBC and Hope Enterprises contend now that Revlon's execs had long been apprised of Hope's print commitment to Arpege, made before the tv deal. A spokesman for Revlon noted a couple of weeks ago that the only notice he knew of was a vague mention at the time of

RICH SPONSORS ARE LUCKY ONES

By GEORGE ROSEN

There's been a lot of fascinating byplay going on involving networks, agencies and their clients as the webs jockey for program and money position in formulating their respective '62-'63 schedules. Invariably somebody gets hurt—and that somebody is usually a sponsor and its agency—but it's all part of the wheelin' & dealin' that's long been characteristic of the business.

Take, for example:

ABC-TV, having committed itself to a bundle of loot (estimated at some $20,000,000) in acquiring "Wagon Train," thought up the idea of engineering a double coup by inviting General Foods in as one of the program's sponsors for next season. In return ABC would offer GF the Wednesday 8:30 post—"Wagon Train" period, thus enabling the client to enjoy a discount on contiguity, if it would install the CBS-berthed "Andy Griffith Show" in the time period.

Had ABC been able to pull it off, it would have represented a one-two punch that would unquestionably have given Ollie Treyz & Co. undisputed Wednesday night leadership.

Except that ABC didn't reckon on CBS' counter-punch. General Foods has long coveted the Monday evening 8:30 to 9 period, on which Lever Bros. and Scott Paper have long had a firm grip. Such an acquisition would give GF a Monday night prime time back-to-back stranglehold, since it also bankrolls the 9 to 10 sequencing of Danny Thomas and Andy Griffith.

GF presently enjoys a 90-minute contiguous discount, since it also sponsors the "Hennesey" show immediately following Andy Griffith. But 10 o'clock Monday isn't 8:30 by a long shot — or by a good many station clearances. So, natch, CBS ups and counters the ABC offer by turning 8:30 over to General Foods. Obviously Lever Bros., which has a big stake on multiple sponsorships going for it at CBS but not near as lucrative as GF, doesn't like it a bit. But, based on past performance, client distress is notoriously short-lived in television, depending on what future network manipulation is in store.

However, should Lever be put in double jeopardy by being knocked out of the Sunday night 9:30 box in order hat CBS can install the new hourlong Alfred Hitchcock show 9 to 10, then that could generate a screaming and yelling of another and far more serious tone.

Lever sponsors Jack Benny in the 9:30 period. As of the moment the network, which is firmly committed to Benny for next season,

'Mr. Ed' as CBS Sleeper

Sleeper of the year at CBS-TV is that talking horse show, "Mr. Ed," slotted Sunday evenings at 6:30 p.m. Filmways' "Mr. Ed" in its latest Nielsen for the half-hour period drew a 25.7 and a 47.2 share, against a 13.8 for "Maverick" on ABC-TV and a 8.3 for "1-2-3-Go" on NBC-TV.

Lead-in of "Mr. Ed" has lifted the ratings of "Lassie" and "Dennis the Menace," giving CBS-TV a strong 90-minute kidult family bloc. "Lassie," incidentally, will be half-sponsored by Campbell next season as opposed to Campbell's full sponsorship currently. Other half will be sold off to an alternate client.

ABC's 25% Cut Of Canada CFTO-TV; $3,000,000 Loan

Toronto, Jan. 2.

ABC International Television, which has loaned CFTO-TV here around $3,000,000, will be paid off with 25% of the station's profits over a long term period. ABC also has the right to propose three members to CFTO-TV's board of directors. Via this route, ABC will be able to participate in the station's operation despite its being turned down by the Canadian government on a proposed outright partnership deal.

American money is in escrow in a Toronto bank and awaiting final signing of agreement with ABC's Don Coyle.

Meanwhile, the Board of Broadcast Governors (State-owned CBC) reports that private tv in Canada is in financial difficulties and, while not mentioning separate "second network" tv stations specifically, says that the governing body is "concerned" about the effect on programming since the privately-owned network has been set up—in competition with the CBC—in such trans-Canada cities as Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Halifax, Winnipeg, Ottawa, Edmonton and Calgary.

Although these "second network" tv stations have been granted licenses in favorable locations, they are "experiencing

No Reserved Seat Policy as D.C. Preps 'Hottest TV Show of Year': Stanton-Sarnoff-Minow Square-Off

It's already being billed as the "hottest tv show of the year"—the confrontation of CBS prez Frank Stanton and NBC board chairman Bob Sarnoff and FCC chairman Newton Minow. The dates: Jan. 19 and 23. The scene: Washington, D.C. No reserved seat policy; first come first served. Matinees every day of the week. Stanton goes to bat first, with Sarnoff in the next-to-closing spot five days later.

It'll be the first square-off with the FCC chieftain by the Sarnoff & Stanton top network command since the recent day-&-date S&S declaration of principles and Minow's San Francisco retort. But these were only preliminary skirmishes, equivalent to a "New Haven tryout," compared to the D.C. performance that's upcoming.

For industry expectations are that the grilling will be sizzling; at the least "very warm for January" within the FCC Capitol Hill precincts as Stanton, Sarnoff and Ollie Treyz (latter appearing for ABC) face the full Commission. Meanwhile they're burning the midnight oil at the respective networks in a mass assembling of their best-foot-forward data.

Telefilms Subpoenaed

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Number of Hollywood telefilmeries including Screen Gems, Warners, 20th-Fox have been subpoenaed by the Senate Subcommittee on Juvenile Delinquency to provide records, prints, files and scripts on certain series, apparently to be used when the committee resumes hearings in Washington this month.

Committee asked for all possible data on "Route 66," SG series on CBS-TV, and 20th's "Bus Stop," an ABC-TV series. Warners' spokesman, while acknowledging receipt of subpoena, declined to identify the series involved, but one report had it as many as six WB shows are named. Warners produces "Cheyenne," "77 Sunset Strip," "Surfside Six," "Hawaiian Eye," "Lawman," "Room For One More," "Roaring 20's" (axed) and "Maverick."

Senate Subcommittee held similar hearings last fall, with witnesses including Four Star and Desilu reps.

TV Daytime Pitch: Pins for Pinups

The bowling ballyhoo is now being angled for the ladies on the daytime network schedules. Innovation in the advertising pitch is being made by AMF Pinspotters Inc. which is splitting around $175,000 between ABC-TV and CBS-TV to persuade the distaffers to try bowling during daytime hours. The AMF buy adds up to 32 minutes on CBS-TV and 36 minutes on ABC-TV.

Of the estimated 32,000,000 bowlers in the U.S., over 12,000,000 are women. The AMF daytime experiment was placed through Cunningham & Walsh.

Ideal Toys Likes TV As Permanent Thing

Xmas splurge aside—and behind—Ideal Toy, via Grey agency, is slating year-round video.

Beginning this month, Ideal's first 12-month tv campaign will kick off with co-sponsorshop of two CBS-TV kid shows, "Mighty House Playhouse" and the weekly Roy Rogers outing. Both shows are Saturday morning. At least one more web show is currently under consideration, and spot and local buys will support the web shows.

NAB Whoops It Up for Collins In Yearend Recital of Progress

Washington, Jan. 2.

National Assn. of Broadcasters ushered in the New Year with a press release extolling Gov. LeRoy Collins' reign at the Assn. and chalking up 1961 as a prestige winner for broadcasting generally.

The statement began with the boast: "NAB laid the groundwork in 1961 for accelerated self-improvement of broadcasting free of encroachment by the federal government.

"The stepped-up program got underway almost immediately after LeRoy Collins took office on Jan. 6 as NAB's 17th president, succeeding the late Harold Fellows."

The NAB puffery emphasized what it described as Collins' efforts to provide "the best possible broadcast service to the public without danger of government interference that could well destroy it." To this end, it recited those parts of Collins reorganization plan for NAB which gained approval of the Board of Directors.

Its overall summation of the year was as follows:

"Despite some troubled times, the year was marked by significant advances and a growing recognition of broadcasting's prestige."

In substantiation, the NAB release cited the coup of having Alan Shepherd as a surprise guest at the Assn. convention last May and the astronaut's praise of broadcasters as "the guardians of the most powerful and effective means of communication ever designed."

President Kennedy's meeting last month with Collins and the Freedom of Information Committee at the White House was also listed as a gain. So was NAB's success in getting a face-to-face meeting between Federal Communications Commission and industry reps on the contraversial new program reporting forms.

As for FCC Chairman Newton Minow's "wasteland" speech, NAB summed up the event as follows:

"Many broadcasters had been upset by Mr. Minow's sharp criticisms of television in his maiden speech before the NAB convention, but Gov. Collins immediately countered that the Chairman had 'overstated his case': that the industry was working hard to correct many of the defects Mr. Minow cited long before he made his speech."

Collins' line regarding FCC was described as "cooperation . . . so long as the regulatory agency does not overstep its authority and seek to dictate program content."

Other highlights of the year as listed by NAB:

—Collins' pledge to help the nation's Governors to thwart juvenile crime through pubservice programs.

—Creation of an NAB Civil Defense Committee of leading broadcasters to work closely with government agencies in planning a broad new program of civil defense geared to the atomic age.

—New stress in promoting the advantages of radio as a medium with its "Build Radio with Radio" campaign.

Minow's Yearend Wrapup Just A Routine Recital

Washington, Jan. 2.

The traditional year-end statement by the Chairman of Federal Communications Commission is not aimed to be diverting literature. And Newton Minow's virgin effort is in line with previous humdrum recitals.

No mention of the "wasteland" and casual treatment of what amounted to a fairly rugged regulatory year for the industry. Minow put it this way:

"As in 1960, the Commission was active in the field of broadcast programming. It proposed extensive revisions in the nature of the programming information which it requires applicants for broadcast licenses to submit. After full hearing, it denied a permit for an FM station to an applicant who had no knowledge of, and has made no effort to ascertain, the programming needs of his community. And it put all broadcasting licensees on notice that they are expected substantially to carry out the program proposals on the basis of which their licenses are granted, or present adequate justification for departure from those proposals.

"A total of 20 shortterm licenses were issued in 1961 where the Commission was unable to find that the past operation of the station merited a full three-year license. Additionally, an Examiner's initial decision recommending that a radio station license not be renewed on the ground that the licensee was 'woefully inadequate' in discharging his broadcast responsibilities regarding 'indecent and obscene programming . . . was pending review at years' end. . . ."

Minow's statement led off with a recital of Commission's effort to devise a plan for commercial space communications, then went into new CONELROD developments, programming crackdown, the push-UHF program, the growth of teachvee and FM, the problem of the congested AM band, and a statistical rundown on broadcasting. No happy New Year was extended.

Jospi Grubisic, "cultural editor" of tv and radio, in Zagreb, Yugoslavia, stated that "American tv, to some foreigners, sounds as though it might be horrible—but after watching it, I think it is pretty good."

He is here to have a look at television and to listen to radio, as part of a four-month tour of this country arranged by the Institute of International Education for the State Dept.

He has already been in this country for about three months and visited New York, Washington, San Francisco, Hollywood, Chicago and Sacramento. The local array of tv and radio outlets, like others throughout the states, caused him to say: "It is fantastic. London, recognized as a leader in tv and radio, has two tv services and one radio system. Here there are

ABC-TV's 'Pops' Show

Three musical "pops" shows, aimed at youngsters, have been slotted on ABC-TV Friday nights at 7:30 p.m. startin Jan. 5. The show is going into the slot vacated by "Straightaway," which is moving into the half-hour starting at 8 p.m. Wednesday nights.

Arthur Fiedler, maestro of the Boston Pops Orchestra, will be host and conductor of the three musical stanzas, titled "Music For the Young." The ABC Symphony will provide the music which will range from the longhair to the light classical. Young instrumentalists will be featured as soloists.

Frederick Heider, formerly producer of "The Voice of Firestone," is producing the shows with direction by Robert Delaney.

'Wells Fargo' Spinoff

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Dale Robertson, star of "Tales of Wells Fargo," and president of his Juggernaut Productions which has a stake in "Tales," will make a spinoff for a pilot of projected new series from one of the episodes planned for February filming.

Robertson and Earle Lyon, "Tales" producer, will shoot the pilot as one of the hourlong segments, in color, for NBC-TV executives who have evinced interest in the story and have been assured Robertson would be available to star.

Minow Has Ally In Colleague Ford

Federal Communications Commissioner Fred Ford echoed boss Newton Minow's sentiments as regards charges of FCC program censorship last week in a talk before a Speech Assn. of America convention group in New York.

In programming that is in the public interest, Ford said, "How he (the broadcaster) does it is his business; that he does it is ours."

He said the broadcaster must go out and investigate to determine the needs and requirements of his own area; then be prepared to demonstrate to the FCC that he has fulfilled these needs and requirements.

"The licensee," he said, "must be prepared to find his own path. We do not propose to guide the licensee on the path."

With the session topic of "What Is Broadcasting in the Public Interest?", Ford outlined for the educators the history and importance of the phrase, to operate in the "public interest, convenience and necessity." Although broad, the phrase provided for the initial licensing of stations and was the basis for further objective legislation, he explained. "The phrase permitted order in the industry," the commissioner added.

On the same program, besides a panel of educators who queried speakers following talks, was Howard H. Bell, veepee for NAB industry affairs.

GERMAN TV BOW FOR EARTHA KITT

Frankfurt, Jan. 2.

Eartha Kitt is set for her first appearance on the German television network.

She has been pacted by Hessischer Rundfunk, the Frankfurt outlet of German TV, to appear on the show "Drei Maenner spinnen" (Three Men Are Spinning), an April 1962 special here, with Bernhard Thieme producing.

German Singer Set As Perry Como Guestar

Frankfurt, Jan. 2.

German songstress and actress Lys Assia has just headed for the United States, where she is pacted for an appearance on the Perry Como show this month.

The singer, who had a big hit with her recordings from "Never on Sunday," will stay for six weeks of personal appearances in the States.

She is following the lead of German singer Caterina Valente, who was also picked by Como for several performances recently.

B-M's 950G Spread

Bristol-Myers, which has just forked out more NBC-TV daytime coin, has also bought an estimated $950,000 in NBC-TV nighttime participations.

Bankroller is going to invest in 32 nighttime minutes, to be spread out among NBC's "Laramie," "International Showtime" and "Outlaws."

HORNE AS HYDE AIDE

Washington, Jan. 2.

C. Phyll Horne has been tapped as Engineering Assistant to Federal Communications Commissioner Rosel H. Hyde. Horne has been a practicing consulting engineer with the firm of James C. McNary here.

Previously, he worked for the Civil Defense Administration and Army Signal Corps as an electronics engineer.

Cronkite & Midgley: 'I Love Luce-id'

After fishing around for one word that might someday fit into a headline, Walter Cronkite and Les Midgley laughingly described their show, "Eyewitness," as "Luce-id."

Cronkite is anchorman and Midgley the executive producer of this regular Friday night news program on CBS-TV, and they claim that they frequently find the very same story they feature of a given Friday night leading the editorial pages of Time and Newsweek the following Tuesday.

They weren't suggesting that the magazines steal from "Eyewitness," merely that the program deals in the hardest news it can find, and, naturally, Time and Newsweek are in the same business.

"The nature of the television business," Midgley said, "is such that news can be covered rapidly. We can change the content of 'Eyewitness' up till airtime and, often while the show is on the air. This gives us a 48-beat on the magazines, whose deadlines are almost like ours only they have to worry about printing problems.

Cronkite added that the "Eyewitness" clan are delighted with their Friday-10:30 p.m. time period, because it's a perfect time to catch up on the week's latest news events."

Asserting that they deal fundamentally in hard news copy for the CBS News half-hour, Cronkite and Midgley, both veterans of the CBS camp, pointed out the number of times, this season alone, where they simply dumped programs that had already been prepared and canned in order to take on the latest, hottest news available.

"Our editorial coverage, if it is that," said the anchorman, "is the courage to throw things out the window because of a later-breaking story. Such things happen on the average of every other week."

Midgley pointed out that "Eyewitness" has a paper budget of about $25,000 weekly, but they've often had to spend more. The two men made an example of the program they did last spring in anticipation of the start of the Eichmann trial in Israel. Said Cronkite: "Dan Schorr was assigned German reaction. Lowell Thomas' unit supplied special material. We had a team in Argentina, where (Eichmann) was captured, and I went to Jerusalem with a unit. You can imagine how costly this was (Midgley estimated it at $20,000 for these out-of-pocket expenditures alone) and yet, before I got back, Gagarin was circling the earth. We dumped the Eichmann material, which never did get on the air because it was that week or nothing."

Just one more example: They dumped a prepared show at 3 p.m. on broadcast day, Dec. 1 last, because of the revolt in Santa Domingo.

Radio Commercials 91.2% Pure In NAB's New Monitoring Sample

Washington, Jan. 2.

New monitoring program launched by the Radio Code Authority of National Assn. of Broadcasters revealed that 91.2% of commercial time sampled was in compliance with Code blurb standards.

Results were divulged in a year-end summary of Radio Code activities which featured toughening of standards and enforcement provisions exemplified by the monitoring program.

Charles M. Stone, the Code Authority's manager for radio, reported that 66 stations in 44 markets were monitored for 397 hours through Dec. 8. The 91.2% compliance record was chalked up for hours generally regarded as "unusually commercial."

The Radio Code Board's refusal to bow to pressure for relaxation of standards, notably booze and femme hygiene commercials, resulted in defection of 10 subscribers to the Code. Another 57 were dropped for non-payment of dues during the year.

Overall, the Radio Code scored a 31% gain in subscribers during 1961—from 1,115 to 1,469 outlets.

Radio Code Board Chairman Cliff Gill lauded the group's action to stand firm on the present standards. He said it was in broadcasting's "best overall interests" depite the defections and sacrifice of ad revenues involved. He averred:

"The Code is proving its worth by assuring higher standards of

Why NBC-TV Is Keeping Baseball: Affils Want It

It looks very much as though the No. 1 reason why NBC-TV, at the last minute decided to retain next spring's pro baseball coverage had virtually everything to do with the wishes of the affiliates.

There were a lot of NBC execs quite willing to let go of the weekend sports package until just a week ago; one, because the sponsorship problem is relatively great, and is great because there are so many major markets blacked-out by pro league rules. But the NBC-TV stations, which get baseball time for local co-op sale, maybe figure to capitalize on the web's sales problem. Moreover, there is still a great deal of prestige attached to baseball for the local outlets, and they let the web know their feelings in time.

One consolation for NBC is that the retention of baseball will negate the need to find two-and-a-half hours of new programming; web would have to fill the Saturday time somehow if the diamond game wasn't aired.

An estimated 120 stations carried NBC-TV baseball last season.

Live CBS Pickup For Lincoln Center Preem Of N.Y. Philharmonic

CBS-TV will telecast the opening night concert at Philharmonic Hall in New York's Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts next September.

The debut concert, preeming the opening of Lincoln Center's first hall, will feature the New York Philharmonic, Leonard Bernstein conducting, with noted vocal soloists and chorus.

The live telecast will be done Sunday evening, Sept. 23, 1962. The historic Philharmonic Hall opening night program on CBS-TV will be produced by Robert Saudek Associates. The Saudek group has produced the programs of Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic on CBS-TV for the past four years. No sponsor has been signed as yet for the special.

VIDPIX INDUSTRY: $150,000,000

Andy, Dick—& Now Jan

Each year the Danny Thomas-Sheldon Leonard-Lou Edelman production combo choose a personality to perpetuate with a half-hour series of his own. Two years ago the nod went to Andy Griffith. The past season it went to Dick Van Dyke. They've now decided to toss the pilot Jan Murray's way. So look for a "Jan Murray Show" out of the T-L-E shop for the '62-'63 season.

For Murray it would necessitate a shift to the Coast and a Burbank origination of his afternoon cross-the-board show on NBC-TV. But even that would probably work as a blessing in disguise for the network, which has been anxious to reactivate live production from the mammoth Burbank studios, more or less reduced to a "ghost town" status in the past several years.

Murray, in fact, has already made some feelers to his program staff anent a N.Y.-to-L.A. move.

ABC Moves Into 'Fighting Third' Position on News; Smith Deal Set

By HERM SCHOENFELD

The enlistment of veteran news analyst Howard K. Smith in ABC's news corps was the yearend climax to the network's strategems during 1961 to become a firstclass news power. At the end of the first year of the reign of Jim Hagerty as the web's news boss, ABC-TV's bid could be measured by the tripling of its news staff in New York, the doubling of its Washington staff and a similar reenforcement in foreign capitals. And behind the scenes, the recent addition of Bob Lang as administrative aide to Hagerty is shaping up as an important keystone in the ABC news operation. ABC-TV execs believe the web, which was not in contention before 1961, is now at least a fighting third.

In joining ABC's news department, Smith took an indirect but unmistakable swipe at his former bosses at CBS which he left after a disagreement over policies. Smith said he anticipated no difficulties at ABC over his right to analyze and interpret the news. "I'll be working with newspapermen who understand the problems. My difficulties arose when I was not working for newspapermen."

Smith, who goes on ABC's payroll as of this month, will be preparing for the Feb. 14 kickoff of his new half-hour, Wednesday at 7:30 p.m. show, as yet untitled but projected as an analytic wrap-up of the previous week's global and domestic developments. Bill Weston, who worked with Smith at CBS several years ago, will produce the Smith show, which is being bankrolled by Nationwide Insurance of Columbus, O. Smith brought the package to ABC.

Smith will also be available for other ABC news assignments, but

CBS, ABC Involved In a Title Conflict

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Similarity of title and format of two shows headed for network airing early next year has created a conflict between ABC-TV and CBS-TV that may cause one or the other to order a few changes. ABC's "The Human Thing To Do" out of the Ralph Edwards shop has set up a claim of priority over CBS' "Humantics."

Latter is slated for a January slated for a January start while ABC is looking for a time slot to install the Edwards spin-off of "Truth or Consequences."

Edwards stated that the first pilot of "Human Thing" was made five years ago and that it was offered to CBS but rejected. "Humantics" is a Wilbur Stark production of recent vintage, according to ABC. Spokesmen for ABC are claiming infringement. No comment was offered by CBS.

Formats of the two shows are similar in that a panel of three contestants will judge what should be done about a filmed situation shown them. Woody Woodbury, nitery entertainer and record artist of Ft. Lauderdale, Fla., was picked by Edwards to moderate "Human Thing."

Revlon's 'Ichabod' Buy

In a flury of Year-end business, Revlon has picked up one-third sponsorship of CBS-TV's "Ichabod and Me," starting Jan. 9 and running for a 13-week cycle.

In daytime, Gerber Products has bought two alternate week quarter hours in "Captain Kangaroo" and "Millionaire." Buy is for 26 weeks beginning Jan. 26. Kimberly Clark has bought four alternate quarter hours starting in March. Kimberly Clark buy is on "Love of Life," "Password," "House Party," and "Verdict Is Yours."

CBS News Moves To Upgrade Status On Election Front

With Bill Leonard as executive producer, CBS News has set up a permanent election unit for radio and tv to handle the 1962 Congressional and state campaigns and elections and to plan for future coverage. Unit will be charged with handling both the complex technical aspects of the coverage along with the editorial side.

Paul Levitan, director of special events for CBS News and the tv network, will serve the new election unit as consultant. He's had considerable previous experience in this area. Other members of the unit have yet to be designated.

That CBS has taken the initiative to upgrade its political campaign-election coverage hardly comes as any surprise, for this aspect of the network operation was "hurting" vis a vis the power and the glory (and the Nielsens) redounding to NBC. Both in the primaries and November election in the '61 mayoralty campaign CBS was administered a severe drubbing.

GODFREY BOWS OUT OF 'HUMANTICS' TVER

Arthur Godfrey is no longer associated with CBS-TV's "Humantics" half-hour series. Understood talks with Godfrey broke down when he expressed an interest in doing a variety show next season on the web, in addition to fronting the projected "Humantics" series.

Godfrey still is open for a possible variety stanza next season on CBS-TV, on an if sold to sponsor basis. "Humantics," featuring film and a panel, may be utilized as a spring replacement for an axed show in the spring. Cancellations notices are up Jan. 22 on two weak CBS-TV entries, Bob Cummings and "Father of the Bride." Cummings is seen to be definitely out: "Father" is dependent on the signal of General Mills which has the time slot over a 52-week period.

STILL GROWING, DESPITE BEEFS

By DAVE KAUFMAN

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

In spite of the cascading waves of criticism bombarding tv regularly—and the telefilm series in particular—the vidpix industry is racking up a production volume of approximately $150,000,000 this season. And prospects are this mark will be exceeded next semester.

This seemingly paradox situation stems from the fact the criticism is over the quality of tv, but when the chips are down and the Madison Ave. gentry shop for new product, they invariably turn to Hollywood and the telefilmeries. It's a bit late to revive the cliche debate of live vs. film, and that's not the intent here. Even though it's conceded there may be a mild comeback for live next season, the overwhelming statistics economically pinpoint film as the best buy. Sure, even the vidpix producers themselves often concede quality leaves much to be desired, but there is an effort being made to upgrade quality, even though the tradesters and viewers may often question this.

Leading Hollywood's telefilm parade is Revue Studios, MCA's subsidiary, located at once was Universal-International studios, in Universal City in San Fernando Valley. MCA acquired the UI lot several years ago as an important step in its expansion program, and the MCA-Revue combine spearheaded by MCA chief Lew Wasserman today is generally regarded as probably the most hep, sharpest film operation in Hollywood.

Revue has 16 series this season, but is aiming for more. That's why there has been an almost continual physical expansion at the old UI site, with stages being constructed and more facilities being planned to take care of not only the telefilmery, but theatrical film production. On the latter score, UI rents space from Revue, and it's expected that Revue will enter theatrical film production in 1962, when the agency and telefilmery will become separate entities. Screen Actors Guild, which had granted MCA a waiver for vidfilm production, and MCA have reached an agreement that the agency will either get out of the agency or production business by September, and the expectation in the trade is that the Wasserman-Taft Schreiber braintrust will concentrate on production, ankling the agency biz.

Runnersup to Revue-MCA in production are Columbia Pictures' subsidiary, Screen Gems, and Warner Bros., each with eight series. The SG unit has had a fairly good season, but the same can't be said for Warners, since the Burbank lot has already lost one series ("The Roaring 20's"), and is expected to lose more. WB for the first time in years did not rack up a new sale last season.

Other volume producers in Hollywood are Four Star Television, and 20th Century-Fox, each with five series, and MGM-TV, with four. Four Star, the telefilmery headed by Dick Powell a decade ago, has a good reputation in the trade and enjoys good prospects for next season. 20th is a questionmark, not only because several of its series are shaky, but because of a change in production chiefs. At MGM-TV, the situation is better even though some of its series are not too secure. That's because the studio wrapped up a hit this season in "Dr. Kildare," and for the first time has impressed the networks—so much so it sold a 1962-63 series ("The Human Comedy") last November.

Another success in a generally drab season was still another medico show, "Ben Casey," made by the reactivated Bing Crosby Productions. Yet series holding up well this semester include "Wagon Train," "Bonanza," "Perry Mason," "Gunsmoke," and "The Adven-

All Three TV Networks Jumping On Daytime Billings for 1962 As Outgrowth of Past Year's Price War

All three of the television networks are reporting their best daytime business in years. CBS and ABC are virtually SRO for the first quarter of 1962. NBC, with higher charges, is running at an estimated 75% to 80% of sellout.

One of the chief reasons for the markedly increased amount of daytime business by ABC-TV, CBS-TV and NBC-TV is, ironically, the outgrowth of a price war that in the past year or so has cut charges before dark to a point where it's almost impossible for sponsors to resist the highly efficient cost-per-1,000 return that ensues.

Furthermore, by way of a second reason for the bullishness, the budgets of the big tv underwriters have been going up. Related to this budgetary rise is the mere fact that advertisers who've never tried daytime and brand new companies and new brands are entering the field.

Between noon and the close of afternoon telecasting by the web, CBS-TV is all but sold out. In its 10 a.m. to noon hours, hurting some months ago because of the intense three network competition for bucks and audience, CBS with admittedly "low rates" is doing fairly well. For example, the "worst" week CBS-TV says it has in the first quarter is one in which only 60 of the 98 available minutes are sold, and chances are that this figure will improve too in the next couple of weeks.

NBC-TV, all day, is hot, by its own tabulations. The network's three-quarters or more sellout is in part based on its relatively high rating picture, although CBS is neck-and-neck in the p.m. hours. One of the NBC rivals maintains that the network is "definitely holding its price structure which is a point of admiration to us," and the other rival believes, but cannot uncover proof positive, that "NBC, too, must be doing some rate cutting." Speakinfi for itself NBC insists that it is refusing all business that calls for undercutting the pressent rate card.

ABC-TV is a relative newcomer into daytime and because of that it established originally lower prices than either of its entrenched rivals. Today, on ABC daytime, a bulk advertiser can get his minutes for something like $2,000 apiece, not much less than figures cited elsewhere in the industry at various times recently.

Here's a random but impressive view of the kind of business that has been flowing into daytime for the first quarter, which caused ABC to state that it needs a "shoehorn" to work in any upcoming biz for the months between January and March ABC is only a case in point.

NBC-TV estimates that in the work week between Xmas and New Year's, it earned about $3,000,000 in new pre-dark coin. Three weeks earlier, the network acknowledged

Heston's FDR Voice-Over

Charlton Heston will speak the words of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt on ABC-TV's series devoted to the Roosevelt years, which starts in the fall of 1962. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt is acting as consultant to ABC-TV and will also appear in the series.

Robert D. Graff and Ben Feiner, exec producer and producer respectively for ABC-TV's Winston Churchill series, will work in similar capacities on the F.D.R. story. Series will comprise an opening one-hour stanza and 25 half-hour shows.

CBS-TV Appraises Season's Specials, Finds Verdict Plus

In a midseason of specials on CBS-TV, with half of the scheduled 24 specials aired, web is of the opinion that its concept of "specialized specials" is paying off.

Terms of reference for assessing the web's limited number of entertainment specials are these, according to Jerry Leider, who wears the twin CBS-TV hats of director of program sales and director of special programs. Specials should offer added balance to the web's schedule; costs should be realistic and free of red ink; there should be the factor of prestige; and the ratings should be there.

In this era of three network competition, Leider concedes that with the exception of a Bob Hope, or a few other shows of his caliber, the era of the blockbusting rating special is over. The web though entered the '61-'62 year with some shattering rating results of specials the previous season, when specials were more numerous and not only didn't carry their rating weight as a whole, but bit into the viewing habits of such preempted faves as "Perry Mason" and "Rawhide."

Web, toting up the ratings for the 12 entertainment specials telecast to date, drew an average of 20.1 for the one-shotters. That compares to the overall network nighttime average of 18.4 from the Second Nielsen report in September to the First Nielsen report in December. The 20.1 average is weighted by the huge rating number, 41.8, for the "Miss America Contest" and the low of a 7.4 for the "Young Peoples Concert."

Here are some of the rating highlights in the web's roster of specials to date: "Victor Borge," 20.1; "Carnegie Hall Salutes Jack Benny," 17.7; "Danny Kaye," 22.8; "Power and the Glory," 18.1; "Leonard Bernstein and the New York Philharmonic," 10.6. The two Westinghouse drama specials, "Dispossessed," and "Come Again to Carthage," drew a 15.1 and a 23.5 respectively. Breck's "Dorian Gray," a 15.5, admittedly not as high as the sponsor would want. Again, though, sponsor feels its getting the type of audience it wants through its "Golden Show-

DONNA REED'S SHOW AS DAYTIME STRIP

"Donna Reed Show," distributed by screen Gems, is being offered as a daytime strip for networking. Possible deal being bandied around would have the show bow out of its nighttime berth, with a production furlough being taken if a daytime network strip deal is consummated.

6 New Pilots On 20th-TV's Roster

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Six pilots will be filmed at 20th-Fox TV between Jan. 15 and Feb. 15 if current plans are finalized, it was revealed by production vp William Self.

The studio is negotiating for Arthur O'Connell to star in "Misty," half-hour family drama series based on a 20th-Fox film made last year; plans a half-hour "Halls of Montezeuma" pilot, based on the 20th-Fox film about the Marine Corps; "5 Star Final," a 60-minute N.Y. newspaper series; an untitled half-hour series with an African background; "Dateline: San Francisco," 60-minute newspaper pilot starring Rod Taylor, and "The Commuters," 60-minute dramatic show.

Starting Feb. Howard K. Smith

Howard K. Smith, as you know by now, has joined the ABC-TV News staff.

He starts work on Wednesday, Feb. 14, at 7:30 PM. At this prime time period each week he will report on and analyze the news of the week, the issues of the day.

When the news warrants it, when the issues demand it, Howard K. Smith will extend his analysis by person-to-person interviews with the persons in the news, by firsthand reports from ABC newsmen overseas, by special film coverage.

But principally, in his weekly news review, sponsored by Nationwide Insurance, Howard K. Smith will be free to do what he does best. He will examine, sift, analyze, interpret. He will, when he deems it possible and pertinent, spell out the effects of today's news on tomorrow's headlines. And he will, in all instances, train his lucid, tempered insights and foresights on those matters that matter most in this our world today.

Thus, a good part of the news analysis that was lost to television audiences when Howard K. Smith resigned his last post is now restored—in prime, evening viewing time. We shall all be better-informed citizens for hearing this man speak his mind.

Desilu Distrib Outfit Sells Major Batch of Stanzas to So. America

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Desilu Sales, new distrib arm of Desilu Productions which opened its first sales session last week prior to organization going into full swing this week, sold its entire batch of syndication offerings in the only foreign pitches made to date, to Peru and Argentina, DS veepee and general manager Richard Dinsmore reported. Reps from the U.S. and org's various global outposts attended initial meet.

Included were 38 segs of "Guestward Ho!," 39 "Desilu Playhouse," 78 "The Texan," 39 "Harrigan and Son," 93 "The Ann Sothern Show," and 86 "The Untouchables." "Untouchables" is being offered on the foreign market only and three inquiries have already been received from Italy.

Desilu Sales has opened offices in Chicago, L.A., Denver, N.Y., Atlanta, Vancouver, Toronto, Montreal, London, Paris, Tokyo, Sydney and Mexico City, with the latter servicing Latin America although the company will also have reps in Buenos Aires, Sao Paulo and San Juan, Puerto Rico. Paris hq. will service the Middle East.

Dinsmore explained "we're priming the pump with Desilu product," but said DS will also handle outside product, and the company is currently negotiating for cartoons, feature films and half-hour vidfilms, both first-run and rerun. Desilu Productions plans a return to production of first-run syndicated telefilms, with at least one, and possibly, two series planned for the fall of 1962.

Dinsmore said he considered this a good time to go into the distribution field despite the downbeat in syndication because "there are bound to be some network cancellations," and because "everybody in syndication has been running the other way, cutting their sales staffs back."

He predicted a resurgence in syndication, and said the downbeat was due mainly to syndicators themselves, that instead of finding sponsors for series in markets throughout the U.S., they took the easy way out and tried to sell directly to stations. The so-called "small" market has been virtually ignored by syndie salesmen, he said, adding Desilu Sales planned to send reps to markets all over the U.S., regardless of size. Syndie salesman have not created biz, but have been trying the hard sell, he added. Another factor in the syndie situation is that the market has been glutted although not with quality films, said Dinsmore, who for over nine years was with Screen Gems, and was SG western sales manager when he exited to form the Desilu distribution company.

Desilu Sales is currently negotiating with CBS-TV for clearance of distribution rights to 14 Lucille Ball-Desi Arnaz 60-minute specials, Dinsmore said.

Kaye's Couplet

Danny Kaye was doubling on New York's video channels last Saturday night (30).

While Kaye was hosting a show for the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies on WPIX, the NBC "Saturday Night at the Movies" was showing "On The Riviera," a Kaye starrer made in 1951.

Some Hot TV Action In A One-Channel Town; Austin Applicants File

Austin, Jan. 2.

A foreseen thaw in the UHF situation is causing action in the Austin tv arena. Two applicants have applied for permits to operate on channel 67.

Such movement is watched keenly here, since Austin is a "one-channel" town, having only the channel 7 station, KTBC-TV, owned by Mrs. Lyndon Johnson. The only other usable VHF channel in the Austin area is channel 9, to be occupied in the spring by educational station KLRN-TV.

Latest to apply to the FCC for a UHF permit is Austin Broadcasting Co., Inc., owned by Willard Deason. Austin Broadcasting operates radio station KVET in Austin. Midland oilman Dalton Cobb, who had earlier applied for channel 24 and said he had reason to believe a permit was coming through. Deason's application, of course, throws the matter into possible hearings.

Deason said his application was based on strong indications that UHF is going to be made healthier by federal action.

He said he wanted to be ready when either there's a switch to all-UHF for commerical television, or set makers are required to build in UHF as well as VHF.

Cobb is such a firm believer in UHF he's spending his oil money on a Midland station, KDCD-TV on channel 18. The station is due to go momentarily.

Deason is a veteran broadcaster who got in on the ground floor at KVET along with nine other veterans returning from World War II. (The call letters reflect the owners' GI background.) First president and general manager of KVET was John B. Connally, who's running for governor of Texas. Deason eventually bought out all the other stockholders.

Deason's application with the FCC listed assets of Austin Broadcasting as $654,950 and net worth as $615,104.

The application listed 236 shares of stock at $100 par value, with Deason owning all but two shares. His wife holds one share as beneficiary, and his attorney, state senator Charles Herring, one. There are also 80 shares of treasury stock in the company.

Max Lerner TV Series Target of Anti-Commie Study Group in Ohio

Columbus, Jan. 2.

Despite protests by the Franklin County Anti-Communist Study Group, Ohio State Univ. television station, WOSU-TV, will show a 13-week videotape series on "The Age of Overkill," based on a recent book by Max Lerner, "Beyond the Power of Principle—The Age of Overkill." The Anti-Communist Study Group sent protests against the television series, as well as a similar radio series which started over WOSU Radio last October, to Gov. Michael V. DiSalle, Univ. President Novice G. Fawcett, and trustee board chairman John W. Bricker of Ohio State Univ., as well as the station's program directors. The protests included the alleged pro-Communist record of Lerner, who is currently professor of American Civilization and Institutions at Brandeis Univ.

Ronald Thompson, dean of special services at the University, said he would view every one of the 13 programs in the series before they went on the air. He also told the protesting group he would review all 13 radio tapes which have already been broadcast on WOSU Radio. Both series are reviews of events leading up to present world tension. Thompson said the series, distributed to 58 stations by the National Assn. of Educational Broadcasters, has been reviewed by a panel of "responsible educators."

NBC's '87th Precinct' Sold to Anglia-TV

London, Jan. 2.

Anglia-TV has scheduled "87th Precinct," the series NBC International sold outright to the welsh indie station TWW. Deals with Tyne-Tees-TV and Southern-TV are in the offing, too.

At a time when the equity strike is killing live drama and other hitherto live series, TWW's first wholly-owned major U.S. show is filling vacant dramatic slots in Anglia's programming in preference to old feature films being screened by the majors.

Texas State Optical's New Ziv Allegiance

Texas State Optical, which has more than doubled in size since entering tv in 1956, continued its exclusive six-year association with Ziv-UA with new deals involving "Everglades" and "Ripcord."

Optical company bought "Everglades" for telecasting on KMID, Midland; KFDX, Wichita Falls, and "Ripcord" on KENS, San Antonio. More markets are expected to be added to this initial buy. Advertiser's first Ziv-UA series was "Boston Blackie" in 1956.

'Bold Journey' Reruns

Reruns of "Bold Journey" are in 72 tv markets, according to distributor Banner Films.

Show hit the syndie mart after three years on ABC-TV. Additionally, Banner is also handling a second Jack Douglas-produced series, Douglas' "I Search for Adventure," the syndicator says, is now in 41 markets.

San Francisco—Leslie Stein has been named program director of ABC's KGO-AM, succeeding Ed Smith. Stein comes from job of program director at Bartell's KYA.

St. Paul Amendment: It Won't Be a Sin To Show Com'ls on Sunday

St. Paul, Jan. 2.

Aimed principally at discount houses, the proposed new Sunday closing law to be voted on by the city council this week has been reworded so that it will not halt on the Sabbath television commercials and newspaper ads the purpose of which is to stimulate the buying of articles on the proscribed list.

It was apparent to its supporters that the Sunday closing ordinance could not pass if one of its clauses might be subject to the interpretation that the measure knocked out most of the Sunday video commercials and newspaper ads.

As now constituted, the ordinance, believed certain to pass, will require nearly all business places to shutter on Sunday, the same as downtown non-discount stores have been doing.

Discount houses have been keeping open on Sundays and doing a landoffice business, hurting the non-discount department establishments especially.

A similar ordinance is being prepared in adjoining Minneapolis

The Bishop & the Happy Client

Chicago, Jan. 2.

Bishop Fulton J. Sheen, who has a half-hour program of his own in syndication, believes that the sponsors of murder and mayhem shows on tv are doing themselves implicit harm.

"I think there is an unconscious correlation," he says, "between the ethics of the advertiser and the ethics of the show he sponsors. If a man allows himself to be represented by an unethical program, is he himself not wanting?" If a man cheats on his tv program, will he not cheat on his product?"

Bishop Sheen's Chi sponsor, Magikist Rug Cleaners, wholly concurs. The company underwrites three Chicago programs which do not get high ratings—"Great Music From Chicago," "Books and Brent" and the Bishop Sheen stanza—and yet, according to its prexy Bill Gage, business continues to improve in a way that is directly traceable to tv advertising.

Says Gage, "A really worthwhile program may get a lower rating than a second-rate western, but in some ways it benefits the sponsor more. The people who seek out good programs with a certain amount of intellectual value are the very people who will seek out a sponsor's products to show their appreciation. Western fans, by contrast, simply don't do that."

It was Gage, by the way, who had put Bishop Sheen back in syndication as producer of the new syndie series. It's being distributed by the Chi firm of Cooper, Burns & Golan.

HOW RERUNS GET MAJOR TEST

Prices Spiral on Post-'48s

Increase in post-'48 pix prices ranges from 50% to 75%, according to the market. In some markets, with one or two stations, and no competition for product, the price incline is small. Prospects are for a continued upward price spiral in pix as the product pool diminishes.

In New York for example, where there are really three stations competing for first-run post-'48 product, first-runners are being sold in the neighborhood of $20,000 per pic. It's understood, for example, that Metro secured about $21,500 per pic for its most recent bundle of 30 sold to WOR-TV. Other stations competing for first-run post-'48's now are WNBC-TV, as well as WCBS-TV.

FM Listeners Buy More Corn Flakes, Canned Soups Than AMers in Mpls.

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

Tom Ruben, son of the principal owner of WLOL, one of this city's leading radio stations, and general manager of its FM division, insists that FM audiences in this area have increased considerably in number the past year and now, in the Twin Cities alone, the FM set ownership has increased from 20 to 30%.

What's more, he asserted that WLOL, one of his dad, Eddie Ruben's, numerous and varied interests, is "finally out of the red" as far as FM is concerned. It has been a substantial AM moneymaker for years.

Ruben says that WLOL has a survey to show that FM listeners buy 9% more corn flakes and 11% more canned soup than regular radio listeners.

Description of the manner in which Ruben goes about selling FM hereabouts indicates that he is largely responsible for his station's emergence from the FM red. He feels that he has been a local "missionary" in selling FM to the public and advertisers. He wishes that other local FM stations would pursue the same course that his station pursues for this kind of broadcasting.

Ruben says that he makes it his business to acquaint as many as possible with FM because the ones who don't know what it is are so numerous. He asks if they know what FM is, what sort of programs they think are on it, do they own a FM set and what sort of radio programs do they like and do they enjoy "really good music—the finest."

One of the main FM problems, of course, is the comparatively high price of its receivers running from $50 to $100, Ruben points out. During his "missionary" work he says he strives to impress upon radio dealers the value of convincing customers of FM's "vastly superior sound." He also uses his influence to get radio stations to bring this out.

Ruben in a newspaper interview said that the FM audiences, because of the receivers' high price, always have been considered "special" ones, but he doesn't feel there's a need for this. His visits to appliance and radio stores are incognito to ascertain if the clerks know enough about FM and are trying to sell the receivers.

Bob & Ray Library Into Syndication

Broadcast comedians Ray Goulding and Bob Elliot are syndicating the "Bob & Ray Comedy Library," three-minute bits in packages of 260 or 520 segs culled from the Bob & Ray radio recording and tape vaults.

Stations will be offered a one-year lease on the packages allowing for unlimited repeats. Second-year renewals will be for a complete new package.

New syndication venture will be through Graybar Theatrical Production Co. with Vic Cowen, the team's producer-director for the last seven years, as manager. New firm, with the slogan, "Puissance Without Hauteur," is in addition to the blurb production enterprise of Goulding-Elliott-Graham and its animation division, Phoenix Studios.

WFMT, CHI, GOING STEREO FULL TIME

Chicago, Jan. 2.

WFMT, the FM-er that crashed into the Hooperatings a couple of years back, is going into multiplex sterocasting in a big way. After the first of the year, more than 50% of the station's programming will be stereo.

New stereophonic program lineup will include a series of live performances by the Fine Arts String Quartet originating in the WFMT studios, and separate series Gilbert & Sullivan operattas and Shakespeare dramas, both presented in their entirety.

Official's Seymour Reed: There's No Place in TV For Stopgap Programs

Official Films prexy Seymour Reed, viewing the year's syndication activity, says stopgap tv programming is a thing of the past. Diversification with quality product, he says, is what bails out the syndicator these days.

During '61, says Reed, Official made 513 sales of 35 different video series in 151 markets. The sales covered 86 of the top 100 U. S. markets.

In New York, Reed noted, his company sold seven series to four outlets, giving Official a total of 15 shows on the city's six going channels (WNTA is dark till educational administration takes over).

Market for Official began to stabilize in the early part of '61, says Reed, and it was as a result of supplying better product for more critical audiences.

Ben Larson to Helm 'Hearing Highlights'

A new one-hour weekly tv news show, called "United States Hearing Highlights" will be offered to stations. Producer will be G. Bennett Larson, former v.p. of WPIX, N. Y., and editor-commentator will be newsman Clark R. Mollenhoff.

Plan is to have "Hearing Highlights" condense proceedings of Congressional investigations each week. Series' first will be the FCC's investigation of radio and tv network broadcasting of Jan. 23.

'WAGON TRAIN' KEY TO FUTURE

The rerun hour vidfilm series, both as syndication entries and for networking, a system that had its real birth in '61, will have its first major test in '62.

For the '62-'63 season, ABC-TV plans a late night strip starting at 11:20, programming the strip with reruns of "Wagon Train" and WB 60-minuters. Plan is to have rerun episodes of "Wagon Train" twice a week, with the other nights of the week filled with rerun WB product.

To date, the rerun hour vidfilm entries have been less popular than "Wagon Train." If that golden oater clicks what's the future for a "Perry Mason," "Bonanza," "Gunsmoke," "Untouchables," etc., on the rerun trail? Many a station is interested.

This season, MCA TV came into the market in March with four off-network hour series, including "Riverboat," "Suspicion" "Overland Trail," and "Cimmaron City." Prior to MCA TV's entrance, National Telefilm Associates has sold rerun hour product of 20th-Fox in syndication. The NTA effort, though, was small in comparison to MCA TV's. Coming in with four series, backed by astute selling, has paid off handsomely for MCA TV. The MCA TV entries, in a tight local time situation, have been sold in about 75 markets.

Others, not having the array of MCA TV product and coming in later, didn't make out too well. MGM, with 24 "Islanders" and 13 episodes of "Asphalt Jungle" has tabbed only eight domestic markets for both series. "Jungle" alone copped the markets of N.Y. and Los Angeles. 20th-Fox, with 26 episodes of "Hong Kong" and 16 of "Five Fingers," has sold the rerun hours in about 30 markets. Hobbling the sale of the Metro and 20th-Fox entries, other than quality, is the station need for a larger quantity of episodes for stripping.

The hour reruns to date in some key situations haven't made any rating noise. WABC-TV, N.Y., for example, programs "Hong Kong" Saturday nights against the pix product of WCBS-TV and WNBC-TV. Ratings of "Hong Kong" on the ABC-TV flagship aren't imposing.

However, to accept the current test of the hour reruns as evidence of success or failure in the ratings is wrong, according to some station operators. Frank Shakespeare, v.p. and general manager of WCBS-TV, N.Y., for example feels that the test will come next season when the winners such as "Wagon Train" are riding the rerun trail in what ordinarily are considered non-network time slots.

Shakespeare said at the begin-

Shakespeare: Local Stations Must Develop New Marketing Patterns To Offset Spot Biz on Networks

By MURRAY HOROWITZ

With participation buys growing on the networks, it's incumbent on local stations to further develop advertisers who for one reason or another can't buy the networks, Frank Shakespeare, v.p. and general manager of WCBS-TV, made this and other observations, in a yearend interview.

Shakespeare, who helms the top commercial station in the country, said the participation buys have put the networks in the spot business. National advertisers can now buy short-term, regional deals in their participation network buys. There was a time, years back, when a Procter & Gamble, for instance, would buy a network program and allot monies for a variety of reasons to national spot. That no longer holds true to the same extent, with the growth of network participation vehicles. It's now a must for local stations, Shakespeare said, to further develop advertisers who because of their marketing patterns can't go network.

Bulk of sponsor monies on CBS N.Y. o&o flagship currently comes from national spot biz, in a ratio approximating nine to 10. Shakespeare, because of company policy, could not be drawn out as to the dollar volume of the station. He did say this, though, in response to a question, that "to our certain knowledge we have a very substantial commercial (gross) lead over any other station in New York."

As to how the station sales force is handling the increasing problem of networks in the spot biz, Shakespeare pointed to the Macy's department store account and the introduction of a newspaper, the N.Y. Herald Tribune, as sponsor of a newscast. WCBS-TV, like other N.Y. tv outlets, predicates its rates on a three-state coverage area, embracing a potential of approximately 15,000,000 people. A Macy's with a main outlet and suburban stores can be weaned into the medium on the basis of the station's coverage and rate card. Ditto the New York Herald Tribune, which bought the local station's 11 p.m. news show, on the basis of its complementary rather than its competitive aspects. Shakespeare, in going over possible local accounts, said that an advertiser whose business is dependent on one retail oulet wouldn't find a buy on

Documentarian Wolper Says Minow 'Best Press Agent I've Ever Had'

David Wolper, the independent documentary producer who is in the midst of a busy season, has an imposing roster of projects slated for next season. Possible projects include a series of 10 one hour specials for a client, a half-hour documentary series, and an hour dramatic documentary series.

Wolper, now based in a three-story Hollywood building, was in N.Y. talking to networks, advertisers, distributors and others on '62-'63 plans. In passing, Wolper said that as a documentary maker, he couldn't hire a better press agent than Newton Minow, FCC chairman. He credited Minow for the receptive climate for documentaries now existing in the trade.

Currently shooting "The Story Of" series for Ziv-UA, Wolper was high in his praise for the Ziv-UA arrangement with indie producers. Wolper said that he has no interference from Ziv-UA in shooting, once the project and the idea of the individual episode is okayed. He likened the current Ziv-UA setup in tv, with that of United Artists' arrangement with independent motion picture producers, an arrangement, he added, which has proved very successful with the parent company United Artists.

Wolper, whose production outfit this season has been represented with shows on the network and local level, said that he expects to make a new deal with Ziv-UA, covering at least two series. Indie documentarian also has a deal going with Official Films for the production of the "Biography" series, narrated by Mike Wallace.

Current deal with Sterling Television, covering six entries this season, expires with "Hollywood: The Talkies," which will be sponsored by Proctor & Gamble next

Minnesota's Talking Point: More TV Sets Than Washing Machines

Minneapolis, Jan. 2.

The Minnesota video industry undoubtedly enjoyed a happier New Year's than likely would have been the case if there hadn't been issued at 1961's close a federal census bureau report indicating there are more tv sets than washing machines in this state and that, of course, autos are greatly outnumbered.

Twin Cities' tv station heads feel that these figures help to explain why, as they repeatedly claim, "it pays greatly—more, perhaps, than in most other sections of the country—to advertise in Minnesota on video."

Also, these station executives don't believe that the figures cast any reflection on some phase of Minnesotans' cleanliness.

According to this just issued government report, all but 128 929 of the 1,119,271 Minnesota housing units had at least one tv set and a total of 74,757 at least two sets in 1960. At that time, there were 153,444 of this state's households without washing machines. One auto was owned by 613,408 Minnesota households, two by 201,187 and three or more by 27,252.

season in November. P&G also sponsored the recent "Hollywood: The Golden Years" on NBC-TV. The six entries were made under the banner of Wolper-Sterling Productions and included such documentaries as "Biography of a Rookie," and "The Rafer Johnson Story." All of the Wolper-Sterling entries were either networked or sold on a national spot basis to a sponsor.

Wolper, under his own banner, has three documentaries slated this season for the DuPont outing on NBC-TV. One of them, just completed, is the "Birth of A Broadway Musical," which follows the trials and tribulations of "Subways Are For Sleeping" until it opened on Broadway. Wolper was less than happy that the musical opened to mixed reviews. He said, though, it still will be around in May when his "Birth" show is telecast. There's been a six-month advance sale for the show, he explained. Others he's doing for the DuPont series are "Invasion, the Sixth of June," a documentary on D-Day, and "Biography of A Movie," based on the Bob Hope, Bing Crosby pic "Road to Hong Kong."

Wolper, who occupies a unique position in broadcasting, credits the network blackout of his original entry "The Race for Space" some seasons back for some of his success. If a network had allowed it on, says Wolper, "I probably would have gotten a good review and been forgotten." The storm kicked up by the network blackout helped to establish his name as an indie documentary producer. Currently, he's one-of-a-kind outfit. Wolper says he stays away from controversial subjects because networks still are jealous of that province and possibilities of a sale are severely limited. He also stays away from the news documentary area for the same reasons. There is a wide area, though, in which he can operate in the documentary field and in that area he's buzzing with biz.

not before the Wednesday night show is fully shaken down. The opening Smith show will probably originate from Washington, then shift back to New York until the D.C. studios are equipped with adequate production facilities to handle the researching, film editing, cartography, etc., necessary for the show.

Until Smith's stanza fills in the 7:30 p.m. Wednesday berth, a series of six ABC News' special reports have been booked into that time period. Initial one, titled "Profile of An Astronaut," kicks off tonight (Wed.).

Meantime, Smith will run out his commitments to CBS on Feb. 11 when he does an interview with Carl Sandburg on the occasion of Lincoln's birthday.

CBS-TV Specials

case." Ratings cited are Nielsen and Arbitrons converted to a U. S. base. It should be added the web's anni rerun of "Wizard of Oz" drew fabulously well in the ratings again, and the Chevy 20th Anniversary, a 15.7.

Oscar Katz, programming v.p. of the web, who incepted the "specialized special" concept, feels that it works and will be continued by the web.

Leider noted too that unlike previous seasons the program costs of specials are not making red ink run for the web. The Breck "Golden Showcase" for instance is being brought in at a program net cost of $125,000. That compares favorably to the cost of hour vidfilm series episodes.

Upcoming on the specials roster to fill out the remainder of the season are Westinghouse's "The Good Years," Judy Garland, three more Breck "Golden Showcase" dramas, two of which will be "Saturday's Children" and "Fourposter," Henry Fonda and the Family," and three more "Young Peoples Concerts" and two more "Leonard Bernstein and the N. Y. Philharmonic Concerts."

All CBS-TV nighttime specials this season out carries full sponsorship.

It would be ideal if all the four factors of measurement were realized on each and every special. Sometimes a special clicks in one or more of the web's yardsticks; sometimes in all. Overall, though, feeling of Katz, Leider & Co., is that specials to date have lived up to their premise of helping to add balance to the schedule, of being brought in on a realistic cost basis, of offering prestige, and healthy ratings, in general.

Hour Reruns

ning of pix programming on stations some local tv operators buying lacklustre product made the wrong prediction that features just wouldn't draw viewers on tv. It was quite another story when other tv operators bought the quality feature product and bought quality pix in bulk. Shakespeare said he would be watching the ABC-TV test next season with keen interest, for the hours might prove out to be alternative programming for pix when the cinematic pool runs dry.

Jack Paar, it should be noted, will be out of his late night NBC-TV berth next season, a change which offers an optimum climate for the ABC-TV hour rerun push. Warner Bros. product will be drawn from such series as "Roaring 20's," "Sugarfoot" and "Bourbon Street," to fill out the remainder of ABC-TV late night strip. It will be the likes of Wagon Train," though, which will test the future of the hour reruns.

Shakespeare

WCBS-TV economical. The marketing spread of the local or regional advertiser should approximate the reach of the station, upon which rates are predicated.

As to local programming, Shakespeare said the station remains heavily committed to feature programming. With its "Early," "Late," "Late, Late Show" and weekend pix plays, CBS flagship telecasts 26 different pix weekly. Station has one of the largest backlog of pix in the country, with features from Metro, Columbia, Universal, Paramount, Warner Bros. and others. Some recent post-'48's have been sold away from WCBS-TV, but Shakespeare explains the station can't buy all the packages. He adds, with emphasis, that WCBS-TV remains very much in the pix buying field. Station topper sees no lessening of feature programming in the next six years which in tv could be called the "foreseecable future." Then, with the drying up of pix product, alternative programming would be in order.

As to local "live" programming, Shakespeare saw a bright future for news, pubaffairs and a dim one in the entertainment field. He expressed regret that local stations can't command the monies and the talent needed to put on local entertainment shows that would successfully compete with what the networks have to offer. In a cosmopolitan market such as New York, Shakespeare added, there really is no native entertainment vein which a local station could tap, a vein ignored by the networks. A southern station, he said, by way of example, might put on a hillbilly show, an entertainment format popular in that particular area.

News, pubaffairs, on the other hand, lend themselves to local station handling.

Shakespeare said that as a professional broadcaster he is concerned with the dry-up of first-run syndicated product. Station, riding heavy with the network schedule, and pix programming, though, isn't dependent on first-run syndie product.

NAB's TV Code

standards of morality and decency." But in translating this spirit into high quality programming, they must rely on "full cooperation and understanding from sponsors, advertisers, program suppliers and the general public."

In the review of 1961 TV Code operations, these developments were cited:

—An increase in the amount of program time during peak viewing hours via adoption of new ceilings on blurb material.

—New guidelines for toy commercials looking toward prevention of deceiving the children audience.

—A "relatively low" volume of complaints received by the Code offices with most of the gripes aimed at program content rather than commercials.

The NAB report said at year's end, 389 tv stations subscribed to the TV Code as against 383 at the beginning of 1961. There were 22 film producing affiliate members, the same as at the start of the year.

Also cited by NAB was the code board's position on a film version of Eugene O'Neill's "The Iceman Cometh." After reviewing the play at a meeting in Los Angeles, the board said in part:

"The play contains some material which normally would be acceptable only to an audience assembled with advance knowledge of its strong dramatic interpretation . . ."

The board said the play as presented will find varying audience responses. The presentation is "acceptable for telecast, but only under special circumstances," the board said. It called for decisions by individual stations based on knowledge of local taste.

VIDEO FAN YENS HOME TV PLAYBACK GIMMICK

Glenside, Pa.

Editor, VARIETY:

Because I don't know whom else to write and because I'm an avid reader of VARIETY and feel it is the hub of show business, perhaps you are the best one to approach with my problem.

Why doesn't someone come up with a "home filming gimmick" for tv sets with a timer that could record a show while you are absent, to be played back perhaps on an open or unused channel and to be viewed at your convenience.

For example, I adore Jack Paar but I can't stay awake long enough to see him and still be the bright-eyed little housewife the next morning. My husband comes first.

That special show put on especially by one of the networks is the same night I'm invited to the best restaurant in town. My social life comes first!

Conflicting shows on the same hour are just as frustrating. I have two eyes, two ears and two tv sets, but only one head (no cracks, please) for absorption. What fun it would be to enjoy one show and know the other is being recorded on another set and can be played back the next day, just for me, curled up in an easy chair by the cozy fireplace.

Please, Mr. Inventor, think. Then put me on the list for the first one made, and do make it reasonable. There must be more tv addicts as hepless as I.

RCA some years ago press-previewed such a rig (Vidtape, rather than film) and said it would be marketed in the 60s.—Ed.

With the Station Reps

Venard, Rintoul & McConnell reppery has pacted the five tv stations and seven radio stations of the Donrey Media Group.

Stations were among those picked up by Bolling when it bought out Headly-Reed reppery, and are among several of the inherited outlets that have fled since the merger.

While high in the hundreds in national market status, the Donrey Group includes some single-market plumbs. Single-station outlets in tv are Reno (KOLO-TV), Fort Smith, Ark. (KSFA-TV), and Laredo, Tex. (KGNS-TV). The other two video stations are KIRJ, Las Vegas, and KFOY, Hot Springs.

The Kilted & The Jilted

Aberdeen, Scotland, Jan. 2.

Jimmy Copeland, kilted emcee and announcer at Grampian Television, north of Scotland commercial program outfit, claimed that he was ordered out of the studio and "threatened with the police."

Copeland has been moderator of the Grampian TV's nightly news-magazine "News and Views" since the North of Scotland company began operations Sept. 20. His contract was recently brought to a premature close.

"They alleged I was not doing my job well enough," said Copeland, "and that I wasn't sticking to the script and was using words like 'wonderful'."

Copeland said that the Grampian company secretary, Alexander Mair, told him, in front of the receptionist and technicians: Get out or I'll call the police."

Grampian Television claimed they acted legally throughout and gave Copeland full advance notice of his release. They said they paid him in full up to the termination of his contract.

Freed's Red China TV Special Format: A Peek & a Poke

By ART WOODSTONE

To make last week's "Khrushchev & Berlin" tv special, the NBC News crew for the program had the difficult task of screening 150,000 feet of available celluloid, an unusually high amount for a 60-minute program. On the other hand, the same crew will be lucky to have more than 20,000 feet to screen in making an hourlong film about Red China.

Writer-producer-director Fred Freed is in charge of both productions, being done for the controversial NBC-TV "White Paper" series, and it might well be that the China stanza, slated for airing on Feb. 25, 1962, will be the most controversial of the nine or 10 that will have been done by that date.

Freed has had his research men working on the upcoming program since late last August, and to them it's possibly the toughest job they've ever faced. It's understood that they've gotten help from the U. S. State Department, but the U. S. and mainland China don't have diplomatic relations and no American (at least no American who can be reached for information) has been on the mainland in years.

Freed's Berlin program last week got extensive critical acclaim, partly because it was so outspoken. The China show promises to be outspoken too. Said Freed: "One estimate says that there are 670,000,000 in China. In any case, it's a large population, and if we are going to have an intelligent foreign policy, it's necessary for people here to know China better."

"We think the more information the people can have, the more intelligently they can judge what our China policy should be. We ourselves don't intend to judge, just present as many as of the objective facts as we can."

But presenting the objective facts when American newsmen don't go behind the Bamboo Curtain and when Red China is trying everything in its power to stifle news about itself is quite hard.

If we were working under great handicaps when we did the Khrushchev-Berlin show, we are still working under great handicaps, but for almost the reverse reasons," the producer-director-writer observed. "For the last show, there was all this disparate footage to put together, and, besides, the story was still developing as we worked so there was no real library on which to depend."

As for China, "who has been there and how reliable are they?" Freed asked.

"There is a basic problem because anybody who was there before the spring of 1959 doesn't really know what has happened; the Chinese, we've learned, have had three major famines since then and apparently the great leaps for-

Kid Spielers in Big Demand as TV Blurb Talent; 'Real Folks' Touch —On Other Madison Ave. Fronts

By BILL GREELEY

How the happy housewife knew the agency commercial producer was still working at 8:30 p.m., he'll never know. But it was the woman's story that really floored him.

He had mailed queries to more than 100 thesps who had appeared in a new client's tv blurbs in order to shape up the agency's Social Security records. Housewife was a respondent who had four kids, ages two, four, six and eight working commercials. She had called to tell the producer that the family had moved from Manhattan's lower eastside to a posh New Jersey community.

Move was made, she said, at the insistance of the kids. They had held a family meeting and voted to buy mumsy and daddy a new home—"Wasn't that nice." At the same session, the tots also had voted for dadio's retirement and purchase of two cars, one for each of the parents.

The producer didn't say, but he no doubt went back to work happy to be part of an industry that could so enrich the life of an American family.

Of course, not many parents are lucky enough to have spawned four philanthropists two, four, six and eight, but any moppet in video beats putting them out on a paper route.

A child blurb performer gets the minimum of $90 for a day's shooting. The residuals from a commercial that appears twice a week on network shows (not unusual) will bring the kid $5,000 in a year.

And kid spielers are in some demand currently with advertisers and agencies. The New York Mayor's office which okays child labor uner a state law, reports issuance of between 1,500 and 2,000 work permit to show biz children this year, and about 75% were for videoscapes. The soap operas use a few. Variety shows like Sulivan and Como feature kid performers. But mostly the moppets are making commercials.

One of the reasons for the popularity of kids is the blurb trend to "real folks." Recall research (where field interviewers check out what viewers can specifically remember from commercials) has shown that kid voices and actions are very popular. And the audience is not fooled by trick voices. The genuine article will double a viewer's recall and an amazing number will come up with actual spoken phrases and words from the mouths of babes.

Before a child can be used in a commercial, clearance must be obtained through the Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children. The Society acts as a recommending agency, sending the okay or rejection suggestion along to the city office. Kids must be cleared 48 hours before shooting, except in extreme cases—production crises, etc. In the case of tots from three months to three years, only studio shooting is allowed, and then there must be on-set facilities for child and mother—a fully-outfitted crib, bottle warmer, comfortable chair for mother and a registered nurse. Sets are subject to Society spot check during production.

Anyhow, lest the "two, four, six and eight" story is not to be believed, the client was Prudential. Talk about insurance . . .

Adsville: WBAI jazz deejay Les Davis was peddling advice to agency men on his Saturday (30) show. Said all the execs from the big Madison Ave. shops (he mentioned Grey, McCann-Erickson, BBDO and Ted Bates specifically) should take a bus tour of New York's jazz joints and dig the mobs of young kids (college mostly) digging the music—"They (the ad men)," he declared, "would get the shock of their lives—" meaning, presumably, that John Q is hipper than Madison Ave. imagines . . . Advertising Federation of America warns, "You may have a date with a Congressional Committee," pointing out that 24 Senate and House committees now have legislation pending (about 200 bills) which could effect ad men, "which could make your job very much more difficult . . . which would reduce the return on the advertising dollars spent—your dollars" . . . Hanes Hosiery splits with Doyle, Dane, Bernbach this week—"by mutual consent"—with the client sticking to the James R. Flanagan agency where some of the biz has been for 17 years . . . Federation of Nigeria has hired James J. Larkin Assoc.'s for pubrelations . . . Royal Castle System, southern restaurant chain (96 units in Miami), to McCann-Marschalk's Miami office.

ABC Radio Setting Peak Pace on New And Renewal Biz

ABC Radio wrapped up a record-breaking $4,409,626 in new and renewed business for 1962 during December, according to Jim Duffy, ABC Radio's v.p. over sales. The new one-month sales mark breaks down into $2,280,110 in new business and $2,429,516 in renewals. With three selling months still to go in the first quarter of the new year, the radio web's sales already show a 37% increase over the completed first quarter of 1961.

The Miller Brewing Co. contributed more than $500,000 towards the overall figure with it's sponsorship of the new nighttime "Good News with Alex Dreier" show and renewing its bankrolling of Dreier's drive-time newscast.

Bul of the new business comes from the following advertisers which are coming in for sponsorships ranging from $100,000 to $500,000: Wrigley Jr. Co., which will be on "Breakfast Club" and "Flair"; J. B. Williams Co. in "Breakfast Club"; Knox Gelatine in "Breakfast Club"; Mar Pro in news; General Foods in "Breakfast Club"; Pepsi-Cola in news; and S. C. Johnson & Sons in Dreier's drive-time news and John Cameron Swayze's weather show. Other New advertisers signed in December include Buick, Accent-International, De Soto Chemical Coatings, Wynn Oil, Du Pont, E. J. Brach & Sons, Rexall, Wheel-Horse Products and Tex-American Oil.

R. J. Reynolds Tobacco is returning to the web for the sixth consecutive year, renewing its participation on the newscasts. Reynolds, along with the following five advertisers, all coming back for the third or more year, each contributed between $150,000 and $650,000 in renewals: Hastings Mfg., Pharmaco, Bristol-Myers, Mennen and Foster-Milburn.

Duffy pointed out that each quarter in 1961 racked up a sales improvement over the previous period, a trend which is continuing into 1962. Duffy singled out the "Breakfast Club" as the bellwether of the radio web's activity. First quarter sales volume for the Chicago-originated show is already $204,000 ahead of the same period for 1961. It'll be the show's best quarter in more than two years.

WOR Palsy Telethon's 410G, With 85% Of Pledges Collected

Do telethonic fundraising campaigns pay off? Definitely yes, according to the results just disclosed on the Greater New York United Cerebral Palsy's two-day telethon over WOR-TV, N.Y., last January.

Final audit shows collections of $410,000, or better than 85% of the $478,000 pledged during the 19½-hour broadcast. Production costs for the UCP telethons, which have been staged annually for 10 years, average around 12%. The total collected by USP for all 10 telethons is $4,160,000.

The 11th annual USP telethon will be staged again on WOR-TV Jan. 13-14, beginning at 10:30 p.m. Saturday night and running to 5:30 a.m. on Sunday. Steve Lawrence and Eydie Gorme again will be the hosts and Dennis James will be master of ceremonies. Tony Cabot's orch will provide the music.

Return of the Natives

A crystal ball may have its uses—we hear it can make any bowler the glassiest in his league—but as a soothsaying device it's a transparent dud.

That's why customs inspectors don't find crystal balls—or ouija boards—in the luggage of the NBC overseas reporters who return home each year about this time for a round-table skull-session on the 12 months ahead.

But our newsmen do have other assets: wisdom, experience and dedication—a parlay that makes this annual telecast a must for any viewer who likes to know where his next crisis is coming from.

This Friday night's "Projection '62," sponsored by the Gulf Oil Corporation, should be especially enticing to those aware of how splendid the sharpshooting was on last year's "Projection '61." A few specifics:

Joseph C. Harsch declared Great Britain would vote for the seating of Red China the next time the subject came up at the United Nations. (He was so right.)

Frank Bourgholtzer, discussing President-elect Kennedy's appointments of Dean Rusk, Chester Bowles and Adlai Stevenson, foresaw that at least one of the three would not be in his post by Christmas. (Mr. Bowles was shifted well before the deadline.)

Wilson Hall was certain that Cuba, in the next 12-month period, would be more blatant about her moves toward the left. (Castro couldn't have been more obliging; before the year was out, he'd made open and lengthy declarations of his loyalty to the Marxist-Lenin credo.)

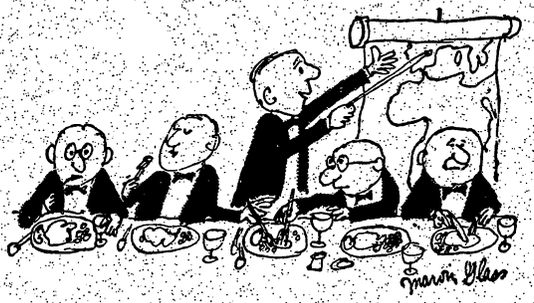
We could extend the "they-told-you-so's" to other areas of last year's telecast as well—Berlin, the Congo, Southeast Asia—but if you were taking notes at the time (didn't everybody?) further elaboration on our part would be superfluous.

Let us merely say that the three aforementioned newsmen will again be on hand for this Friday night's symposium, along with Piers Anderton (Berlin); Cecil Brown (Far East); Bernard Frizell (Africa); Welles Hangen (India); John Rich (Paris); James Robinson (Hong Kong); Richard Valeriani (Cuba via Miami); and Sander Vanocur (White House). Frank McGee will again serve as moderator.

Most of our overseas "visitors" will also be participating in a discussion-tour of 11 American cities within the next two weeks for what has become an increasingly important part of their annual homecoming.

Traveling as a group, they'll be addressing—and answering questions at—luncheons and dinners sponsored by some of the nation's most influential economic, political and journalistic organizations.

The number of stops on these in-person appearances has more than tripled in the last two years, with the audiences getting larger and the questions getting more incisive each season. By the time this tour is over, our stalwarts will be aching to return to the calm of Katanga or the nirvana that is Berlin. Everything is relative.



The newsmen pull no punches on these cross-country stops, either in answering a question from out front or in challenging the opinion of an NBC colleague on the dais. Our correspondents don't consider it their mission to make the diners happy enough to skip all the way home. The enormity of the world's problems is too obvious for that sort of nonsense.

Nevertheless, the trouping newsmen are not above reaching for a laugh or two from their audience when the chance presents itself.

Last season, for example, Irving R. Levine warmed up one patricular group by saying he'd intended to speak about the rapid development of India's motor car industry, but had been told that might not be too congenial a subject. (He was speaking before the Economic Club, in Detroit, at the time.)

Possibly the most serviceable laugh-getter of all was Wilson Hall's account of the way his arrest by Castro was handled by his home-town newspaper in Danville, Ill. Said the front-page headline: "Reverend Hall's Son in Jail Again."

The chuckles are terribly welcome, of course, for the critical issues pondered at these meetings—like the seemingly insoluble crises on the annual telecast—get a bit overwhelming. Commentator John Chancellor wasn't making small talk when, toward the end of last year's "Projection '61," he described the show's content as "a catalogue of horrors.

Yet, let no one mistake our newsmen's fact-facing honesty or unbridled candor for hopelessness. "I cannot completely despair," concluded Frank McGee, in summing up that same program. "That which faces us is of human creation, and is capable of human solution." Or, as we should be reminded from time to time, never underestimate the power of a human.

VARIETY-ARB SYNDICATION CHART

VARIETY's weekly tabulation based on ratings furnished by American Research Bureau, highlights the top ten network shows on a local level and offers a rating study in depth of the top ten syndicated shows in the same particular market. This week six different markets are covered.

In the syndicated program listings of the top ten shows, rating data such as the average share of audience, coupled with data as to time and day of telecasting competitive programming in the particular slot, etc., is furnished. Reason for detailing an exact picture of the rating performance of syndicated shows is to reflect the true rating strength of particular series. Various branches of the industry, ranging from media buyers to local stations and/or advertisers to syndicators will find the charts valuable.

Over the course of a year, ARB will tabulate a minimum of 247 markets. The results of that tabulation will be found weekly in VARIETY. Coupled with the rating performance of the top ten network shows on the local level, the VARIETY-ARB charts are designed to reflect the rating tastes of virtually every tv market in the U. S.

(*) ARB's October 1961 survey covered a multi-week period. Syndicated shows sharing one of the weeks with an alternating or special program are listed, with the multi-week rating of all programs in the time period given.

Tele Follow-Up Comment

David Brinkley's Journal

The same night the David Merrick musical production, "Subways Are For Sleeping," made its bow on Broadway, David Brinkley devoted his entire Wednesday NBC-TV half-hour to a savvy, slick but superficial study of how the show prepared itself for opening night. Brinkley's commentary did not have its usual bite for some reason, but the doing of such a stanza has intriguing overtones for legit producers.

Is it of any advantage to expose the tribulations of a musical in rehearsal to a national audience? There is no answer at this point, because it was never done before, not, at least, before a legitter had time to establish itself on the Main Stem. Guess would be that it can't hurt (which may be a kind of a wishy-washy cop-out) to alert a potential Broadway stub-holder to the existence of the show and, perhaps, to build up interest in the forthcoming legit reviews. However, if the reviews are neutral or bad—as they seem to have been with "Subways"—theoretically, it'll increase the number of people who don't necessarily want to go and see it.

As for the tv show itself, Brinkley's cameras, neatly handled, moved through story conferences by Jule Styne, the composer, Comden & Green, who are the lyricists and book writers, and director Michael Kidd, to the Shubert in Philly for an interview with producer Merrick (who during this tryout stage was mildly dissatisfied with the way things were then going), ensemble rehearsal, adlib musical sessions by the stars, the Boston tryout (which included shots of the big production number, "Be a Santa," and, finally, Brinkley wound it up with the dramatic reminder that while he was speaking (near 11 p.m.) the New York critics were then at their typewriters, dictating whether Merrick and his backers had made a fortunate $400,000 investment or not.

The editing, the multichrome and the other technicalities were done excellently. Art.

NBC White Paper

Producer-writer-director Fred Freed did a remarkably thorough, intelligent and revealing job in creating "Khrushchev & Berlin," the eighth "White Paper" done for NBC News on television Tuesday (26) night.

Taking essentially used footage, Freed working under the Irving Gitlin pubaffairs banner for NBC-TV, reviewed the last six-months of crisis over Berlin. Most of the time, he did so "over Khrushchev's shoulder," a technique that proved blunt and probably irritating to a number of Americans and U.S. Allies. But being forthright is one of the traditions of this excellent series of public affairs specials, so much so that "White Paper" has faced great timidity among potential advertisers.

Freed's insights were developed skillfully, and among them were views of western "indecision" over how to handle the wall between East and West Berlin; a sidewise but telling glance at the fact that the NATO members knew of the Russian plan to build the wall, an analysis of Russia's aims in creating the crisis and the seeming effectiveness of the plan to date. It was a program filled with skepticism, but it was skepticism that was obviously based on fact.

While everyone ostensibly knows the surface history of the six-month-old Berlin muddle, Freed & Co. gave some viewers a feeling of growing suspense as he recounted the story. Some of the footage, incidentally, was superb, little or none of it purposeless. Art.

Dinah Shore Show

The Twist also made it on Dinah Shore's show on NBC-TV last Friday night (29) in an outing that was partially pegged to the latest dance craze and the celebration of the New Year. The once-a-month offering bounced along somewhat unevenly despite the impressive guest array comprising Ginger Rogers, Nat King Cole and George Burns.

The song-and-dance numbers on this stanza were first-rate, including a lovely rendition of "Scarlet Ribbons" by Miss Shore, a smooth hoofing stint by Miss Rogers and a couple of male partners, and Cole's "I Won't Twist" novelty followed by a potent projection of "Where Did Everyone Go." Other highlights included a Dinah-Cole duet on some blues and gospel numbers and a teamup of Miss Rogers with Dinah on "Some of These Days." A long-hair-type of chorale, in which the four principals joined vocal forces, made for a standout finale. It was a device used effectively on previous shows in this series.

The comedy bits were the weakest link in the show. Burns, who handled one set monolog in okay form, was saddled with a running gag about his compulsion to sing that was stretched way beyond its value and impaired the overall pace of the show.

Once again, the American Dairy Assn. turned up with a nifty plug production that ranked with the best musical number of the hour. Herm.

PM East

Mike Wallace's library of personality interviews, accumulated during his WNTA-TV and ABC-TV days, was put to effective use on "PM East" Wednesday night (27) in a Moss Hart tribute. The two-year-old half-hour interview with the late playwright-director was replayed in its entirety and provided the backdrop to the surrounding encomiums from Arlene Francis, Celeste Holm, Martin Gabel and Biff Liff ("My Fair Lady" stage manager), all friends and show biz associates of Hart.

Hart's appearance on the old Wallace show was timed with the publication of his autobiography, "Act One," in which Hart revealed his desperate need for success and riches. For part of the way, and the most interesting part, Wallace pursued this theme in probing whether Hart, now successful and rich, was at last content. On the contrary, Hart pointed out that the quality of his success was disappointing; it had failed to transform his insecurity to well being.

As for being rich, Hart didn't think he was particularly well fixed. He disclosed that he had been making $7,000 weekly for about four straight years from "My Fair Lady" alone, but out of this he kept only $1,000 weekly, a fact which led the discussion into a critique of Federal tax laws as applied to creative artists. In any case, $1,000 a week was barely enough to keep Hart in gold garters or support his compulsion to redecorate his various homes about every six months.

Miss Holm remembered Hart saying, "Your last play shows up in your next electrocardiogram," a line that perhaps explained the playwright's death two days before this "PM East" show was taped. Herm.

Hy Gardner Show

Joey and Cindy Adams were featured on Hy Gardner's local Saturday midnight interview show over WNEW-TV (N.Y.) and, despite longtime friendship, the N.Y. Herald Tribune columnist asked some pointed questions of the AGVA president and his wife who led a State Dept.-sponsored variety show on a globetrot. It was sparked by N.Y. Journal American columnist, Dorothy Kilgallen's, blast against the Adams show, its purpose, "cultural" qualifications and, above all, its economics, to which the comedian's wife had rebutted in an outspoken "open letter" in a Greenwich Village sheet. Gardner's questions bordered on embarassment to the Adams', but they handled themselves well; gave chapter-and-verse on the purpose of such tours; that meeting the common people of the sundry nations (some of them obscure in name and geographical location) among the new African and Asian states achieved more than striped-pants diplomatic relations; that speaking to them in their own language (both the Adams' demonstrated linguistic agility with deft introductions to their acts, admittedly learned phonetically) likewise established a strong common denominator. Gardner asked Adams the $64 question on the high cost of goodwill entertainment, quoting Miss Kilgallen's $25,000-a-week pricetag, and he answered that this covered 25 people, their traveling, housing and kindred expenses, insurance, etc. Gardner pressed for how much of this was Adams' share and when he answered that it came to "one-fifth of my normal salary" the columnist let it rest.

Marilyn (Mrs. Hy) Gardner, usually the femcee and commercial spieler, was a telegenic vis-a-vis with more folksy chitchat, before Gardner segued into bandleader-numerologist Vincent Lopez's "prognostications" bit.

As for Cindy Adams vis-a-vis Dorothy Kilgallen, remember what the man said about a woman scorned? Abel.

Open End

For New Year's Eve, David Susskind turned from the troubled times of the world, its leaders and its citizens to the lighter side of life. His "Open End" stanza that evening featured a discussion on the ways and means of stripping and burlesque, mulled by some of the more renown exponents of the art, namely Georgia Sothern, Sherry Britton, Blaze Starr, Monique MonBar and Libby Jones.

Subjects ranged from technique to the social implications of the profession and shed some interesting and entertaining light on a normally spoken - about - behind-closed-doors and much speculated about profession. The ladies were frank and articulate in their remarks and were a colorful asset to the holiday eve's programming. Susskind seemed to enjoy the

60 Mins.: Tues., 10 p.m.

First of what's planned to be an annual local recap of the year's most exciting and important news events covered by chief cameraman Ken Pratt and his crew of this 20th-Fox's ABC affiliated Twin Cities KMSP-TV, proved to be a documentary the skillful handling of which would have done credit to the station if it had been a network documentary.

In assembling the station's best 1961 film clips, including those of many thrilling and colorful happenings hereabouts, and in the scripting and narrating of the accompanying verbal descriptions and explanatory matter, as well as direction of the whole, KSMP-TV staffers Jim McGovern, Bob Allard, John Sandstrom, Guy Galante and Bob Watson did themselves proud.

What ensued for tuned-in set-owners was a tribute to the past year's expert and widespread camera coverage of important local news by Pratt and his assistants. The clips provided an hour of lively viewing that also spelled nostalgia.

There were camera shots calculated to hold attention from lovers to the politically minded. And in accomplishing this the station's news department, which offered the documentary, is entitled to claim a praiseworthy public service.

Among other things, cameraman Pratt, covering a suburban parade, had been an eye witness to a tragic accident when an auto driver died from a heart attack at the wheel and the car careened into the procession, causing many deaths and injuries. Struck down himself, Pratt still managed to get some film which brought to viewers exclusive footage of the event.

Brought back to life for set-owners was the manner in which the Twin Cities landed big league baseball and football and glimpses of some of the sports doings at the stadium where the games were played. Viewers also saw again brief interludes from the football games of the highly successful U. of Minnesota gridders who landed in the Rose Bowl.

Linked together, too, were brief visits to the state legislature during sessions when the governor and members were seen and heard speechmaking. There also was film which covered the apprehension of two boy killers at a time when crime skyrocketed in the Twin Cities as it did elsewhere throughout the nation.

This show likely won much favorable word-of-mouth so that when it goes on the air again, the next time for 1962, there'll be a large viewing audience waiting. Rees.

(Geyer, Morey, Madden & Ballard)

There are better ways of telling of the history and heritage of America than was done in the American Motors' year-end special called "Let Freedom Ring." The approach was sophomoric and the scripting was tedious and it turned out to be a dull hour despite all its good intentions.

The technique, conceived by writers Richard L. Evans and Michel Grilikhes (latter doubled as producer-director), related the country's glories through the writings and speeches of some of the nation's greats; Patrick Henry, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln. The excerpts had a familiar ring, any school kid could probably recite them, and were handled like a primary school course in American history. Even gueststars Richard Boone, Dan O'Herlihy, Howard Keel and Larraine Day pulling them out of a juve level. Miss Day, in fact, brought it down to a pure meller level, in her over emoting on the reading of a letter from President Lincoln to a mother who had lost five sons in the Civil War.

Best portion of the show came from the Mormon Tabernacle Choir of Salt Lake City (where the show was taped). It's a splendid vocal group and most of their renditions had impact.

American Motors restrained itself to commercials fore and aft. The closer, though, was hammered home in hard flag-waving terms. Gros.

Producer: Mel Bernstein
Writer: Harry Durning
60 Mins., Tues. 7:30 p.m.

WBZ-TV, Boston (film)

In "The Summing Up," WBZ-TV took the subject matter from the previous 11 programs in its outstanding "Complex Community" monthly pubaffairs series, updated it, and produced a comprehensive summary of major problems faced by the Bay State and its capitol city during 1961.

The assignment was monumental—to cover such broad areas as taxation, education, government, urban redevelopment and transportation in the brief span of 60 minutes. But the professional production work of Baker and Bernstein, a hard-hitting, well-researched script by Harry Durning, and an excellent variety of shots, filmed and edited by Phil Galligan and Bob Cirace, accomplished the task.

"Summing Up" featured reports from experts in the aforementioned fields, including Governor John Volpe and Mayer John Collins. Mayer Collins lauded the Westinghouse Hub outlet and series' sponsor: "The Sperry and Hutchinson Company and WBZ-TV, two long-respected citizens of Boston, are to be commended for these objective and informative programs. As responsible fellow citizens they have brought you (the viewer) the facts."

The real value in this telementary—as in its 11 predecessors—was the way it crystalized the significant issues affecting city and state, and generated some serious thinking on these problems. It constituted a strong plea for citizen action.

"Summing Up" was the final 1961 chapter in what was easily the best locally produced pubaffairs series ever to come out of the Hub. Guy.

60 Mins., Thurs. (28) 10 p.m.
CBS-TV, from Chicago

Whatever the demerits posted against CBS News as an aggressive, going operation in the intramural network sweepstakes, the convergence of the web's global correspondents for the annual "Years Of Crisis" telecast, as presented last Thursday night (28), served as a forceful contradiction to any such criticism. A round-table comprising Daniel Schorr, Eric Sevareid, Peter Kalischer, David Schoenbrun, Alex Kendrick, Blaine Littell, Richard C. Hottelet, Charles Kuralt, Marvin Kalb and Charles Collingwood, the latter as moderator, demonstrated anew Columbia's still potent manpower for enlightening a nation. For as such gabfests go, this was a wholly absorbing, engrossing hour.

This time out there was a revitalized "format," for in contrast to previous years, when the year-end wrapups originated from a closed studio, CBS took the tv show on the road, the team "performing" in Chicago before a large gathering of the Chicago Council on Foreign Relations. In one other respect it differed, also, with most of the hour given over to questions aimed at specific correspondents rather than the traditional free-for-all.

This was all to the good, for while it may have had the effect of trimming their sails in "showcasing" their own bailiwick, it made for a more pointed, concise expression of views. The questions, both in written form and addressed from the audience, were germaine to the most crucial issues of the day and aptly phrased. This less formal mode of delving and expounding made for more vivid portraits of the individual correspondents, yet at no time detracting from their information and views. Thoughtful, well-informed men, all, they tackled the Berlin crisis, the Congo, the common market, fallout, the UN, Cuba, etc., with a capsulized positiveness that made short work of the world's gargantuan problems.

It takes some doing to gather 18 correspondents for one show, along with film clips, and all the razzmatazz of electronic journalism, and come up with a dull show. That's what ABC-TV did, though, in "World Prospects: 1962," the hour telecast of last Tuesday (26) night.

Faces, ideas, facts, forecasts crowded the screen from 10 to 11 p.m. There were newsreel clips, imposing music fore and aft of the program, and an extravagant set as a backdrop, yet all the aforementioned elements must have left even the most addicted news, pubaffairs viewers limp with ennui before the 60 minutes were up.

The show was just too crowded, ideas were thrown out without proper development, news forecasts were mixed with news recaps. It was a potpourri that was deadened by just too many ingredients.

The show must have been expensive to produce. There were film clips fronted by the web's correspondents from all corners of the globe. Stories given the year-end treatment included the race for space, a possible U.S.-Soviet summit meeting, Laos, upcoming Congressional elections, Latino developments, the Common Market, U.S. race relations and the newest fad, the Twist. Horo.

Mexico's Third Place TV Status On American Continent; 23 Stations

By EMIL ZUBRYN

Mexico City, Jan. 2.

In little more than a decade, slightly over 11 years since the inauguration of television in Mexico, the industry has made giant forward strides. Today the industry occupies third place on the American Continent and second place in Latin America, only being surpassed by the United States and Brazil.

Mexico has 23 television stations to date, with 22 of these purely commercial and a lone cultural channel (Channel 11) operated by the National Polytechnic Institute. Total potency of stations stands at 780,000 watts and investment exceeds $22,000,000 and growing.

While there are no authentic official statistics on the number of receivers, these total slightly over 1,000,000 sets by now with approximately three-fourths of these lo-

WMAK HOMELESS IN NASHVILLE FIRE

Nashville, Jan. 2.

Radio station WMAK was left homeless when a $2 million fire gutted the 105-year old historic Maxwell House here Christmas night (25).

The station was off the air, however, only 60-minutes, after its basement studio was flooded with water. Currently the 5,000-watter is operating from its suburban-situated transmitter and from improvised offices in the Andrew Jackson Hotel.

THE MIKE DOUGLAS SHOW
With Ellie Frankel Trio, guests.
Producer, Woody Fraser
Director: Ernie Sherry
90 Mins., Mon.-Fri., 1 p.m.
KYW-TV, Cleveland

Judging from its first week's output, KYW-TV's new daytimer, "The Mike Douglas Show," should quickly work up a following and perhaps a steady niche in local television. It also has syndie possibilities since the regional angles are kept to a minimum and also since Westinghouse, station owner, has been scouting for something to get it off the old movie hook, i.e., "PM East and West."

Douglas is bright and brash with a solid 16-year career in show biz, including several years of network tv, big band and nightclub singing and emceeing. He came here via Los Angeles and Chicago, where he did well on NBC originations.

Carmel Quinn was cohost the first week, except that she missed Monday and Tuesday because of a Christmas radio tape commitment with Arthur Godfrey in New York. This week it's Joe E. Brown, and Jerry Lester is due next week.

The second-string talent in the first programs was equally impressive. The opener, for example, had Gretchen Wyler and Dick Patterson of the touring company of "Bye, Bye Birdie." Miss Wyler sang "Spanish Rose" and "Lola" and also chatted a good bit about show biz and the people in it. Patterson, who must have a future as a single, did everything but tear down the studio and was working on the rugs when the management gently removed his microphone. Since he is not a pantomimist, he quit at that point.

The settings, camera work and production in general were smooth and professional, giving even more substance to the syndie possibilities here.

Ellie Frankel is the town's leading girl pianist (jazz type) and she and trio performed admirably, particularly considering that they work all night at the Theatrical Grill, too. Kai Winding brought along his trombone and blasted a couple of numbers. Jim Moran, the super pressagent, was also there, booming a new movie, and Father Joseph Dustin, the banjo playing priest, was along on the opener for some solos and singalongs.

"The Mike Douglas Show" leans more toward show business, with a heavier ration of guests either passing through town, performing here, or hired particularly for the program.

Jerry Lester (under towel) clowns for Tony Pastor, Mike Douglas and Johnny Desmond during a recent session on "THE MIKE DOUGLAS SHOW". Of the new program Lester said "This format and KYW-TV crew are great! I've been able to test routines I've been thinking about for years!"

Lovely Carmel Quinn had a full 90 minutes daily to "work out" new and "pet" routines during her week in Cleveland. Of the program she said "THE MIKE DOUGLAS show is a delight! I loved working every minute of it . . . and I know others will . . . I REALLY mean that!

Year's eve musical potpourri was by George Chakiris, who danced wonderfully, sang well and who surely is destined for bigger things. Despite this young man and some pleasant work by Buddy Ebsen, this hourlong NBC-TV stanza was hardly a sustained success.

It was never bad, but it was rarely good, the humor and talk being at best cornpone or, at worst, fatuous. It was a loosely constructed jaunt across the eastern half of America, and a viewer could sometimes anticipate the musical cliches that were rendered. The program was hosted by Gordon & Sheila MacRae, studded with Jane Morgan, Rita Moreno, Kathryn Grayson, Jack Jones and by the raucous and labored enthusiasms of the Paul Lavalle band.

The Sunday (31) tape telecast often ran down on fuel, and then something would happen, like a Chakiris dance and the old motor (model T variety) would rev up.

This New Year's Eve special from the Waldorf-Astoria's Starlight Roof was like giving a camera eye to one of the old band remotes. There were cutaways to Page Morton and Abbe Lane and a ringer from the audience did a mombo twist, but mostly it was Xavier Cugat fronting his 17-piece band (which seems to have swung from Latino personnel to New York's 802 union hall) and songs by Miss Lane.

Whole outing, however, had an easy-going air with Cugat fronting the band with his little Mexican hound under one arm and a curl-stemmed pipe in one hand. Miss Lane never looked better (sexier, that is) doing four numbers in three languages.

There were pans and close-ups of the dancing aud to good atmospheric effect, and Miss Morton provided contrast with downbeat vocals in a quiet, intimate setting.

At midnight, and at a couple of points leading up to it, there were cutaways to Ben Grauer, a vet observer of the scene, at Times Square. He declared it a more raucous celebration than many in the past.

Sponsor Chock Full O' Nuts also bankrolled the concurrent Guy Lombardo pickup from the Roosevelt Hotel on CBS.

JUNIOR ACHIEVEMENT

Producer-writer: Jim Dooley
Director: Clarence Anderson
30 Mins., Thurs., 9:30 p.m.
TWIN CITY FEDERAL SAVINGS & LOAN
WCCO-TV, Mpls.

In complete, scholarly and highly skillful as well as interesting fashion, this once-every-four-weeks "WCCO-TV Report," public affairs presentation of the CBS affiliate's news department, explores subjects which should be of vital concern to everybody.

Like its predecessors, this particular documentary had to do with a phase of the American way of life. In this instance it devoted itself to Junior Achievement and particularly to the latter's numerous Twin Cities' such groups. They are the teenagers' organizations engaged in various lines of business endeavor under expert tutelage and guidance in a way designed to develop their members' skills and to impress upon the members the free enterprise system's advantages.

Naturally convinced that free enterprise is the foundation of the American way of life and that there is need for such commercial training to help sustain free enterprise—the sort of training Junior Achievement provides, leading Twin Cities' industrialists and merchants and those elsewhere sponsor, advise and finance these groups. They thus expect to help many young people to follow in their footsteps.

Like the series' predecessors, this documentary deserves kudoes for being splendidly written, produced, directed, photographed and narrated. Hats therefore go off to Jim Dooley, Clarence Anderson, Bob Johnson and Dave Moore who were responsible for the aforegoing and who had been acquitting themselves so well previously.

There was a lucid explanation of just what Junior Achievement is, the reasons and need for its existence, the purpose which it serves and what it's accomplishing. During the action-packed, engrossing half-hour, viewers were taken behind the scenes of a number of the groups to witness the members at work and to hear the young leader tell in interviews about their most serious problems.

Prominent Twin Cities' businessmen also appeared on the program, expounding their views anent Junior Achievement and inviting the public to cooperate and assist financially in the Twin Cities grouos' plans. They also urged the purchase of stock in the Junior Achievement companies at 50c per share to help the movement along.

Timex is taking two-thirds of the Hope show in February. Last week, Scripto signed for the other third, the Scripto order coming in first. Watch company is also taking half of the Hope show in March. Considering time and talent, this means that Timex is spending about $626,000 for its share of the two Hope tv'ers.

Since Timex is supplying the rerun of Montand, the sponsor in that case merely has to fork out the $130,000 to NBC-TV in time charges for a one-shot hour. Montand will go into one of two unspecified Friday night slots in May.

TV's Most Dramatic Program Concept . . .

Unprecedented in TV News Reporting

United States Hearing Highlights

Has Proven Audience Appeal

Now, for the first time in television history, timely on-the-scene coverage of significant, drama-packed Governmental hearings is available through the medium of a brand-new weekly hour-long show, United States Hearing Highlights.

Television's greatest hours in the past are best remembered for comprehensive coverage of the Kefauver Crime Hearings, the McCarthy Hearings, the Labor Racket Hearings. Vitally important hearings such as these are being conducted constantly throughout the nation . And now Hearing Highlights will be ON THE SCENE to bring to you and your audience an hour-long weekly condensation of the most dramatic, most significant moments of Your Government in Action . . . informing the American people on critical issues affecting all their lives.

Hearing Highlights is television reporting at its best—with a Pulitzer Prize-winning Capitol Hill newsman providing the "know-how" that projects this show far above the routine news reporting slot. Pulitzer Prize Reporter Clark Mollenhoff serves as both editor and commentator of Hearing Highlights. Mr. Mollenhoff, one of America's top award-winning newsmen, has—in addition to the Pulitzer Prize—been the recipient of the Raymond Clapper Memorial Award, the Heywood Broun Memorial Award, the National Headliner Award, three Sigma Delta Chi Awards and the John Peter Zenger Award.

Mr. Mollenhoff, of the Washington Bureau of the Cowles Publications (Look, the Des Moines Register, and Tribune and the Minneapolis Star and Tribune), was awarded the Pulitzer Prize—journalism's highest honor—in 1958 for his explosive expose of labor union racketeering, a series of articles which touched off the now-historic Senate Labor Racket hearings. His knowledge of behind-the-scenes Washington, his long experience in Governmental reporting make Mr. Mollenhoff a "natural" as commentator and editor of this no-holds-barred brand of Governmental news coverage.

AN ACTION-PACKED SERIES OF AWARD-WINNING STATURE

Hearing Highlights has an audience-proved format—a fast-moving, provovocative behind-the-scenes show that will provide new entertainment and information dimensions for your 1962 programming. It is an appealing weekly package for sponsors; a show that lends prestige and stature to both sponsor and station.

Hearing Highlights is NOT a re-run of old film clips from past hearings. Each week during 1962, Hearing Highlights cameras will be ON THE SCENE at important Government hearings, recording on film and tape for your audience the controversy, the legal and legislative sparring, the humor, the grave and momentous decisions generated by these procedings. And each Sunday, these highlights will be available to you while the hearings STILL ARE IMPORTANT NEWS, FRESH NEWS.

Hearing Highlights has no cast of actors; no make-believe plot. The cast of Hearing Highlights is comprised of real-life people—high officials of our government leaders of our military . . . distinguished legislators . . . leaders of business and industry . . . men and women from all walks of life who suddenly have been projected into the news by the machinery of Government as it maintains its continuing vigil over the freedoms of our land and our people.

HEARING HIGHLIGHTS CAMERAS ARE READY TO ROLL

The first filming by Hearing Highlights will start on January 23, 1962, at the opening of the Federal Communications Commission's investigation and study of Radio and Television Network Broadcasting.

Film and tape highlights of this important hearing will be available for Television and Radio on Sunday, January 28, 1962.

And, this is just the beginning! Mr. G. Bennett Larson, producer of Hearing Highlights, and Mr. Mollenhoff already have scheduled for their cameras an impressive list of hearings during 1962 . . . providing the authentic backdrop for dramatic weekly reports of what the watchdogs of our Government are doing to safeguard our freedoms and keep America strong and secure.

This timely, brand-new show will bring new audience-building strength, new informative entertainment to your 1962 program schedule. And you can buy this full-hour program at the cost of what a first-class half-hour show sells for. Hearing Highlights already is receiving the overwhelming endorsement of leading broadcasters, legislators, government officials and educators. It will pay you to investigate the reasons why Hearing Highlights promises to be the brightest new show for 1962!

company considerably, they being as much a diversion from routine for him as for the viewers.

Intertel

Another corner of the globe was examined in this well-made, incisive "Intertel" series. Title of the latest one-hour telementary was "Don't Label Me," a study of the neutralist position of British Guiana's newly elected prime minister, Dr. Cheddi Jagan.

Seen on WABC-TV, N. Y., Sunday (31), from 5:30 to 6:30 p.m., the documentary proved to be a telling, honest probe of Dr. Jagan and the emerging country which he now heads. This telementary was produced with intelligence and imagination by the Canadian Broadcasting Commission.

Throughout his long interview with CBC newsman Douglas Leiterman, Dr. Jagan refused to align himself with either the east or west. He called himself a humanist and socialist and an admirer of Cuba's Castro. He acknowledged that his criticism of colonial policies may be more directed to the west, for that's where the experience of his and other Latino countries lies. Yet, he retained an innocence of communism and the way its practiced that belied his seeming knowledge and intelligence.

Documentary also caught the setting of this former British colony now in transition toward fuller independence, the poverty of many of its people, the primitive conditions of its economic development, and the color of peoples' personalities. It posed the question of whether western economic aid should be given, in light of Dr. Jagan's "Don't Label Me" position. Concensus of those interviewed, which included a non-native business leader, an opposition politico, and a British governor general, was that the risk of aid should be taken by the west. Horo.

WBBM-TV Views the Press (Chicago)

"WBBM-TV Views the Press," normally an alternate-week Sunday afternoon entry in a 15-minute format on the Chi CBS o&o, was slotted in midweek prime time (9:30 p.m.) on Thursday (21) as a 30-minute special. Outing was a shrewd and knowledgeable survey of the sometimes wayward ways of the four Chi daily newspapers in handling the week's news.

Foreign editor Carter Davidson used admirable restraint in tracing some of the contradiction and occasional bobbles of the press without resorting to sensationalism or heavy handed deprecation of the competing news medium. However, there was plenty that was sensational in letting the newspaper stories speak for themselves. Davidson pointed out that the Washington correspondent for one Chi paper caused a minor panic in the grain market here with a front page story that Poland was going to purchase a scarce grain from the U.S. Prices zoomed in that particular commodity until it was found out that the writer had listed the wrong grain. The paper retracted the story in a brief item on the business page two days later.

In another instance, one of the Chi dailies picked up a wire service story from California that claimed that two women had died from taking an oral contraceptive manufactured by a Chi firm. Stock in the company plummeted 18 points in one day, more than likely wiping out scores of small investors. The women were found to have died from other causes, again two days later.

Davidson also demonstrated the lack of editorial differences (the four papers are owned by two publishers) in the case of their handling of the Congo situation. In each instance, the papers took what Davidson considered an "extreme right wing point of view," although they used different approaches. Davidson did admit that there were greater differences in their editorials on local politics.

News analyst John Madigan contributed a 10-minute rundown on the four gossip columnists, terming their daily pillars "trivia, publicity handouts, and a rehash of stories handled better elsewhere in the paper." He said that they often contradicted other stories in the same paper, and suggested they should cut down to three times a week and stick to saloon gossip. Mor.

CBS' "The 20th Century" which has given some laudable dissertations on a wide variety of subjects changed its style momentarily in its expedition into the whys and wherefores of Dave Brubeck's art. Brubeck, who heads one of the best known jazz quartets, is a scholarly musician who takes his work seriously and who has provided a dimension of articulate literacy to the field of jazz. Like a classical musician, Brubeck believes in developing his theme, but unlike the composer who can develop at leisure, the jazz musicians must improvise on the scene.

Brubeck heads a gifted outfit which has probably one of the best alto saxes in the business, Paul Desmond, plus the other talented members, drummer Joe Morello and bassist Eugene Wright. The separate interviews with the men by Walter Cronkite revealed a highly volatile and exciting art. It was emphasized by Brubeck, that even though they go far afield, they work within a stipulated set of ground rules from which they may not depart. Theirs is a highly disciplined and important part of the musical sphere, and one which has done much to develop the music of this period.

The majority of the show was taped at Brubeck's Connecticut home where it's revealed that he is a family man, who goes for greenery and domesticity and who leads a quiet contemplative life when the wife and kids permit it. There were also scenes from his recent gig at Basin St. East, N.Y. It's quite a contrast from the more publicized musicians who are in conflict with the law on a variety of charges. Brubeck's type doesn't get into the papers. Jose.

Daytime TV Billings

823 minutes had been bought in tv daytime in just a couple of weeks, and that included all of Colgate's daytime investment for the next couple of months. Now Colgate, Bristol-Myers and Whitehall, all with previous NBC-TV buys as a base, together last week added another 183 minutes to NBC, this accounting for a total of $2,000,000.

Besides that, there is a $1,000,000 outlay for "Today," the early morning NBC-TV'er, split between Fruit of the Loom and Revere Copper, both new to daytime.

It's hard to stop with those two when counting new daytime advertisers. "Why, it's almost getting out of hand," one network sales exec laughed. Bristol-Myers is buying "like crazy" for its new Vim detergent, Colgate has Liquid Ajax, Best Foods has Knorr Soups; Dow Chemical is brand new to pre-dark; Kellogg is moving back into daytime ($300,000 in the first quarter alone on CBS); Nestle, from a little daytime business last year, is now prepared to spend $3,000,000; Kimberly-Clark is new to daytime.

Particularly in NBC and ABC precincts, new business is "the biggest thing that has happened." The networks have been working like mad lately, it is reported, to develop new pre-dark accounts. Ironically, CBS, which is said to emphasize other areas of selling more, came up with Del Monte in a recent victory over the persuasions of the other two. Incidentally, this Del Monte biz is felt to be the direct outgrowth of McCann-Erickson's "infatuation with the beauties of daytime television advertising." McCann's Coast people reported wild successes with its Golden Grain product after a pre-dark tv web campaign, and it was this that evidently opened the door for the $940,000 Del Monte buy.

ABC-TV's daytime sector has racked up $11,000,000 in new business during the last month. Availabilities are so tight that some advertisers have had to be turned away because no suitable package could be fashioned out of the available supply of open minutes.

Locked-up sales picture on ABC-TV stems from the entry of numerous new companies and products into daytime network tv during the last year. ABC-TV, for instance, now is riding with 80 companies, representing a couple of hundred different products, on its daytime roster.

Advertisers newly entering the daytime tv ranks on ABC-TV include Clairol, Mennen Baby Products, Dr. Scholl's Footcare Products, Pillsbury, Gold Seal, R. T. French, Campbell's Soup, Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing, Isodine, Hublein's A-1 Sauce and Luden's.

Lorillard, which tested a campaign for Spring cigarets on daytime with a major portion of the business going to ABC-TV, is sticking with the web. So is Lever Bros., one of the original clients for ABC-TV's "Operation Daybreak," launched four years ago. Lever Bros. has bought into the half-hour Tennessee Ernie Ford show which is bowing on the web April 2 in the 11 a.m. slot.

All this business marks quite a switch from last year, when the only thing the competition did for at least two of the three webs was force prices down—and still there weren't enough takers.

Gill revealed he has discussed the Code with Federal Communications Commissioners who advised him that "their regulatory problems would be reduced substantially" if more stations adhered to the letter and spirit of the Code.

"Also," he added, "as a result of my discussions with persons involved in the legislative and regulatory aspects of broadcasting, I am convinced that restrictive legislation would have been enacted were it not for our Code.

Among the "New Look" measures taken in the Radio Code field last year were: stricter time limits on commercial copy; new Code provisos spelling out specifically the bans on personal products such as hemorrhoid cures and femme hygeine items; and substitution of the word "shall" for the old "should" in prescribing and proscribing practices and policies.

says it does not contemplate installing Hitchcock Sunday 9 to 10.

But the fact that CBS has indicated it intends to write off "GE Theatre" in the Sunday 9-9:30 period (a situation that has invited considerable distress at the General Electric agency, BBDO) has suggested to some close to the picture that Hitchcock may yet wind up going Sunday 9 to 10, at GE and Lever's expense (unless they stay with the time and buy Hitchcock).

Where all of this leaves MCA, which in one way or another has been involved in all of the properties and personalities concerned, provides an intriguing footnote. The Hitchcock show, of course, is out of Revue shop, which isn't hurting. But on the other hand "GE Theatre," threatened with cancellation, also carries an MCA identification tag. And so does Benny. The epilog has yet to be written.

He pointed out that some of the thriller and gangster shows are not exactly to his taste, but then "you can't expect all people to like highbrow entertainment—and the people enjoy these shows."

He said that "when you realize that tv in America is an around-the-clock matter, then you will agree with me, I think, that they do a good job. No one can be a genius for 24 hours a day."

He would like to take some of the commercial documentaries to show to his people. He was also impressed with the discussion programs. He disliked the quiz shows and thought that many commercials are in bad taste.

Grubisic pointed out that commercials in Yugoslavia come in one solid block. They broadcast tv for about five hours a day. Three times per week they transmit 15 minutes of commercials.

Idea of this filmed half-hour skein is to retail stories, based on fact, that defy rational explanation. Thus, in "The Avenger," a German general in occupied France, attempted to recreate a party held by a French marquis on the eve of the Revolution. His ghoulish object was an invite the villagers, dress then in period costume, dine them and wine them —and then ship them off to forced labor Germany.

But the plan misfired, for the guests fled to the woods. Only the local priest turned up for the feast, which was duly held. Mysteriously, glass was shattered, a disused fountain began to spout, and minuets came from the air. The wrathful General shot his French mistress, whom he suspected of being at the bottom of the supernatural doings, and the climax was his own death at the hands of an invisible mob, just as the Marquis had been killed by his peasants 150 years before.

This maintained a fair interest, but John Newland, who introduces and closes each segment, provided some very questionable evidence for its truth. Also, the character of the General, as played by Andre Morell, was so irredeemably black that it lacked conviction. Otta.

smaller but deeper, for the diving acts. On a stage 30 by 30, there'll be plenty of room, NBC feels, for the "dry acts" taken from vaude and comedic ranks. Arthur Cantor will be associated in the production with McKnight.

Network hasn't yet fixed pricing on its tickets, but it will be a reserved seat affair, after the fashion of a Broadway show.

Web hopes that the water show will rank alongside Radio City Music Hall as the town's "biggest live" entertainment attraction. And, naturally, there are hopes of using the "Aqua-Carnival" as the basis for a one-shotter on NBC-TV, but whether before, during or after the season, NBC Enterprises boss Al Stern and the NBC-TV management haven't yet decided.

Incidentally, the last time there was a water show on the island of Manhattan was in the '20s when the old Hippodrome carried one for a brief stint. NBC, obviously, intends running its own water show for two consecutive months, twice daily.

Mexico's Third Place TV Status

cated in the Federal District (this capital and its suburban areas).

The industry takes pride in the fact that it is 100% Mexican, and has not relied on foreign technicians because of the know-how of such outstanding engineers as Guillermo Gonzalez Camarena and Jorge Suarez. Initially several American technicians worked on setting up of first installations, for a 60-day period. And since then foreign consultants have been called in from time to time to supervise and revise existing installations periodically. However, technical operation is completely in Mexican hands.

As a source of work, both direct and indirect, the industry employs upward of 20,000 persons including writers, actors, producers, scene designers, directors, musicians, technicians, etc. And these prepare programs reaching an audience estimated as nearing the 6,000,000 mark.

This is only the beginning, for in January of 1962, the Department of Communications is expected to act on applications for 22 new channels. Despite official denials, it is expected that one of these, at least, will be assigned in this city.

Mexico now produces around 80,000 television receivers annually, and production facilities are to be expanded for expected boom when gaps in republic-wide coverage, especially in deep south areas such as Acapulco, Oaxaca, Yucatan and Quintana Roo blossom out with stations.

Color, subject of controversey at the moment, may yet be sprung as a surprise by Emilio Azcarraga and his Telesistema Mexicano early in 1962. Although Azcarraga, in a press statement sometime back, inferred that color in Mexico was not feasible and "too costly" to make it practical, it is known from an inside source that Guillermo Gonzalez Camerena is furiously working at perfection of what he calls a "chromatic" system. While technical details are not given out, this apparently works on a kaleidoscopic principle.

The Camerena color system has the advantage, allegedly, of not requiring a color receiver, or any adaptations of standard black-and-white sets, to receive color images that reportedly are clear and sharp. Tests over a Guadalajara channel, as well as closed circuit work by Camerena, apparently have reached the point where there are no bugs in color transmission. However just when this system will be sprung on the Mexican public is Azcarraga's secret.

Mex Feevee, Color?

Robert Najero of Najero Films has also said that standard system color will come to Mexico within six months. This would make it somewhere around May of 1962, with color allegedly to be unfurled on a new channel in this capital. Programming to include retransmission of American programs, and inclusion of ordinary black-and-white shows, to fill out available time. The Najara system is to be offered as feevee, according to his own statement, with this ranging from $8 to $12 monthly. However, no confirmation of either new channel authorization, or official okay for color feevee can be obtained from Department of Communications officials.

In the standard programming over existing channels, there's far too much reliance on filmed and videotaped series, especially those imported from north of the border. There has been a good deal of sound and fury directed against American episodics in recent months, because of their preoccupation with violence, brutality, killing, sex and other unacceptable themes, even including presentation of ways of life far removed from that lived by the average Mexican family, as depicted in "Father Knows Best," for example.

Main campaign is centered against too realistic oaters, crime and thriller shows, and as this is written the Departments of State and Communications have worked out their "new deal" for local television, with this involving censorship to be imposed via the film Bureau. Nothing much is known about this except that "radical" changes are anticipated, and this can be interpreted in a possible official ban against the more objectionable American produced episodics.

Mexican programming, especially in field of episodics, is downright amateurish; badly produced and acted, and obviously suffering from too little financing and too fast a shooting pace. Few of these shows, however, are able to get Mexican tv time. As a matter of fact, tv producers incurred wrath of feature length producers in fall of last year by stringing together three or four sequences of an episodic, calling it a feature, and releasing this theatrically. This practice has now stopped, not so much because of any federal or producer intervention, but because pictures did not make money at the boxoffice.

Television has, however, been a major force in bringing entertainment to citizens in the low income groups. Workers who could not afford tickets in the past now see and hear opera, bullfights, concerts, ice shows, boxing, football, plays, musical revues, folklore, etc. on the homescreens for free. It has been argued that this wholesale telecasting of spectacles would harm boxoffice. Actually there has been no boxoffice decline, and poorer segments are getting their first look at top entertainment.

As a result of over-optimism in financial forecasts, these trans-Canada tv stations were hard-pressed to meet their program commitments, made to the BBG. According to Stewart, there is lack in tv variety and the stations are not providing Canadian programming in the 7 p.m. to 11 p.m. slots, despite their pledges.

AFM Cheers ABC Network Ruling; 'B'cast Bargaining System Saved'

Washington, Jan. 2.

Although the pronounced split on the National Labor Relations Board in a television musicians' bargaining dispute turned out to be academic, the decision has nevertheless has been hailed as a significant victory by the American Federation of Musicians.

In a 3-2 decision, the board reversed an earlier ruling, overrode the recommendations of its trial examiner and dismissed a complaint of unfair labor practices against the American Broadcasting Co. by the splinter Musicians Guild of America.

The board also significantly ruled that any negotiations between musicians' union and the networks should hereafter be on a "nationwide multiemployer unit" basis.

MGA and AMF merged last fall, making the question of which is the proper bargaining unit at ABC a moot point. But it was the additional unit designation ruling which meant victory for the AFM (as well as the networks which sided with the union).

A legal representative for AFM in Washington, in citing the decision as a triumph, added:

"If the board had affirmed its earlier position, it would have destroyed the whole system of bargaining in broadcasting. Not only musicians, but other entertainment craft unions would have been affected."

The whole issue revolved around the disagreement between the board on the one hand and the AFM and the networks on the other over designation of the negotiating unit; as well as an AFM-ABC contract negotiated before MGA won the representation election at the network.

In March, 1959 MGA sought to win bargaining rights on film music-making, asking that three separate units limited to Los Angeles County be set up for negotiations with the networks.

The networks, joined by AFM, contended that bargaining should be on the nationwide multiemployer basis because that is the way it had always been done.

They also produced a new contract that had been negotiated with AFM, the union security and deferral provisions of which barred a new election, according to the networks.

In December, 1959, the board ordered elections at ABC and CBS,

tures of Ozzie and Harriet."

Despite the fact a few of the hour-long entries scored this season, the sentiment in the trade is that the networks went overboard on the longies during last spring's buying season, and the impetus will return to the half-hour length this next time around. Tradesters point out the over-emphasis of the hour show was a bad thing because (1) such shows are so expensive they require multiple sponsors, and the result is none of the bankroller are happy when they neve to split the tab with so many others, feeling there is no sponsor identification for any of them; (2) if a network has two so-so or mediocre hour shows the same night, it kills that night off financially, whereas with four half-hours in the same time, this would be less likely; there is a glaring shortage of writers, and this is more pronounced in the 60-min. segs which requires much better yarns to keep the viewer tuned to the show; the price of a hour seg is so high, it makes for an almost prohibitive investment.

Of course, the hour show will be with us, despite these sound reasons against it. But the difference is the networks are expected to be far more choosey before going into such deals, and there is apt to be much less stretching of half-hours into the longer segs (a la "Tales of Wells Fargo").

Still trembling from FCC Chairman Minow's attack and subsequent network pressures over violence in tv, the industry actually hasn't suffered much from having had to remove the violence from its programs. As a matter of fact, many execs and producers will agree that it was a good thing, that the writers have had to turn out better scripts as a result, and the producers to do better work, unable any longer to rely on old-hat fights, etc. for their dramatic content.

However, apparently inspired by the hub-bub from Washington, viewers are writing in protests as never before, despite the toning down of violence. Their beefs cover the spectrum, from a complaint "Calvin and the Colonel" was derisive of that respected southern institution, the colonel, to one from a John Birch Society supporter over a CBS-TV "Naked City" seg which hadn't even been aired. (He'd heard somewhere the story of an American Nazi was an attack on the Birchers). Execs and producers have learned to take the beefs in stride, but they often express disappointment the networks give them so little support when the complaints come in.

An oft-heard producer beef is that the networks say they want more mature, adult drama to meet the criticism tv's diet is too bland, but when such fare is filmed, the nets are the first to run for the hills if somebody writes in complaining that this type of show is on tv. "You can't have it both ways," argues one exec of an anthology show which specializes in such themes, but has been the target of criticism from stations, viewers and sponsors.

In a medium noted for playing it safe, this situation is not surprising.

As for the next season, the pilot situation shapes up with a surge of comedies and a wholesale trend to the medico shows, this latter the obvious result of "Ben Casey" and "Dr. Kildare." Most of the telefilmeries are working on various phases of the medical profession's operations (no pun intended), and this includes projects on psychiatry, the public health service, nurses, plastic surgery—you name it. If it has anything to do with the white brigade, it's being projected as a series.

Of course, latching onto a trend like this has its hazards. The most notable example occurred this season, when a flock of animation cartoon shows came on in prime time, a result of the success of "The Flintstones." As of mid-season, none of them had scored even mildly, and at least one was axed.

Much the same thing happened several years ago, when Warners' "77 Sunset Strip" registered so strongly. The following season there was a rash of private eye apers, but none of them made it like "77" and they are long gone, while the Strippers roll on.

Again, this season CBS-TV tried a carbon of "Wagon Train" by ordering a similar series, "Frontier Circus," from Revue, which films "Train." "Circus" at its best is just a pallid imitation of "Train."

Actually, tv's problem is that there isn't enough creative brains to supply quality material every night of the season. It's a dilemma not faced by the motion picture industry, which nonetheless has had more than its share of troubles finding enough good, box-office product.

It's questionable that tv will ever be able to solve what appears to be an insoluble situation. There just aren't that many top producers, writers, directors and actors around. In the face of this dilemma, tv can only try to upgrade quality, but anyone who thinks the day will come when tv fare will all be top-quality, be it live or film, is living in dreamland.

Behind the scenes, steps to better programming are evident. The studios are gradually eliminating the hacks, be they producer, writer or director. (Sometimes even a studio is known as a "hack operation" because of its product, but these lots aren't doing too well these days.) Not too long ago, the hack—the merchant of mediocrity—never had it so good. He was in great demand because he fulfilled the one requirement—he did it fast and met tv's quick shooting sked—and this applied to the writer, producer or director—sometimes all of them. One of these hacks—a writer who candidly admitted he was just that—told us a few years ago he was earning $75,000 a year because of his ability to turn in a script quick—not good, but quick. That situation is changing today, and most producers are trying for superior talent.

No one close to the situation would for a moment predict next season will see any great rise in quality—the word itself defies any such long-range prediction. But the real difference these days is that in most sectors of the Hollywood telepix spectrum, there is an honest effort being made in this direction. Most executives and companies recognize that the day of the get-it-done-quick-and-under-budget-if-possible operator is vanishing.

The hack is still here, but fewer doors are open to him than ever before.

New Orleans — Rupert Copponex has taken over as program director of WWL-TV. He has been a production-director for the station for three years, too, a 13-month leave of absence in November, 1960, and returned to replace Robert Guy, who resigned.

Payoff On An Image

Dunoon, Scotland, Jan. 2.

Here's a twist—a 48-year-old viewer, spinster Mary Winifred Harper, has left $4,560 to her tv idol, BBC newscaster Richard Baker, in her $54,000 will, just published.

Miss Harper first met the newscaster when she invited him to become honorary president of the Scot branch of the British Televiewers' Society. She was secretary of the branch.

Said Baker: "I suppose it started with Miss Harper becoming very fond of the television image of me. Then we met. She was an honored guest at my wedding."

Andy Griffith (CBS); "Dennis the Menace" (CBS); Danny Thomas (CBS); "Mr. Ed" (CBS); "My Three Sons" (ABC); "Dobie Gillis" (CBS) and "Car 54" (NBC).

The click half-hours as represented by "Hazel," "Car 54" and Joey Bishop are undisputed factors in NBC-TV's reemergence as a hot network this season (though in no way minimizing that network's success in achieving a balanced programming schedule) and, for all the success of a "Defenders" and a "Gunsmoke," it's the emphasis on situation comedy that's parlayed CBS into its No. 1 position.

ABC's decision to put new emphasis on comedy in plotting next season's schedule merely serves to reaffirm the increasing Nielsen stature of the situation comedy. The fact that ABC shows up with only one show in the Top 20 national Nielsens, and that a situation comedy, would seem to offer proof positive that it bet on the wrong cycles by going thataway instead of thisaway in formulating '61-'62.

finding insufficient interest at NBC for one. It also brushed aside the negotiating unit and contract contentions.

MGA won the March, 1960 election at ABC, but lost to AFM at CBS. Guild overtures to begin negotiations were met two months later by an ABC refusal and renewal of its unit and contract arguments.

NLRB Examiner James Hemingway held a hearing in Los Angeles in September, 1960 on AMG's unfair labor practices complaint against ABC for its refusal to bargain.

Five months later Hemingway recommended that the board cite ABC for unfair labor practices and order the network to "cease and desist."

After interim network appeals and arguments, shored up by two Supreme Court opinions which held that similar contract deferral provisions could not be overlooked in determining legality of union security clauses, the board reversed itself.

Members Philip Ray Rodgers and Boyd Leedom disagreed sharply with the majority of Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, John H. Fanning and Gerald A. Brown.

In a written dissent they said the Supreme Court opinions were not pertinent and charged the majority with ". . . undermining the principle of administrative regularity, and . . . weakening the integrity of board decisions."

Entering their sixth year, the fellowships have been held by 40 representatives of the broadcast journalism field working in 21 states and three foreign countries.

Oscar Katz, v.p. in charge of programming for CBS-TV, was instrumental in making Carol Burnett an honorary member of the truck-drivers' union.

The way Katz tells it, he had a terrible time finding a cab for Miss Burnett after Wednesday's CBS News bash at the Waldorf-Astoria. Finally, in front of CBS headquarters at 485 Madison, a truckdriver recognized the comedienne and stopped to offer her a lift. Miss Burnet accepted. Katz helped her in the cab of the huge trailer truck which drove her to her midtown apartment. She is now, according to the driver, an honorary member of the Teamsters Union.

Representatives of the three major religious faiths in Chicago have amen-ed the petition of the Chi chapter of American Federation of TV and Radio Artists that the FCC hold public hearings on the license renewals of the NBC Windy City o&os, WNBQ and WMAQ. A telegram was dispatched to the Commission last week stating that public hearings held in Chicago "would give us the opportunity we desire to appear publicly and express our evaluation to the Commission of the service WNBQ and WMAQ have offered to the people of this area."

The wire was signed by Rev. John S. Banahan, director of radio-tv for the Archdiocese of Chicago; Dr. Edgar H. S. Chandler, exec vice president of the Church Federation of Greater Chicago (Protestant); and Rabbi Irving Rosenbaum, exec vice president of the Chicago Board of Rabbis. It stated also that "the religious communities . . . recognize the broadcast media as among the strongest forces for good and evil in our society today."

ATAS' lecture bureau formerly functioned as a single national unit until it was lately divided into eight separate chapter committees.

A recent Chicago-datelined story (VARIETY, Dec. 20) on WNBQ's ascent in the local ratings, via parent NBC-TV's click this year, was based on the October ARB and Nielsen reports. Soon after the story ran the November Nielsens came in, showing that WBBM-TV's "Best of CBS" feature film on Saturday nights snapped back with a 27 rating versus a 13 for WNBQ's "Movie 5." Also, "At Random," Irv Kupcinet's talkfest, perked back to first place after midnight on Saturdays, beating WNBQ's wrestling show until 1:30 a.m.

Because no available American has been in China for about 12 years, Freed has gone to Japanese, French and particularly Canadian and English sources—"but the problem is even complicated with them. None of them has been there for any considerable period of time, and how much can a man be expected to conclude in one month?"

As the result of the famines, China, which had grown into a giant industrial power in the previous eight or nine years, has turned off as much as possible the normal information supply route out of Hong Kong. As for the Chinese refugees, Freed observed, many of them are unwilling to talk because they often have relatives still on the mainland. Then, too, quite a few of the refugees come from richer Chinese provinces, so that there views might have a parochial outlook. Besides, Freed warned, in true journalistic fashion, "they are refugees and left probably because they have some kind of argument with the Chinese government." Implication was that this might color their objectivity.

A Swiss journalist, Fernand Gigon, went into China last spring and summer—he was the latest of NBC's sources on the scene—and shot about 5,000 feet of film. He was there about six weeks, Freed recalled. The rest of the footage was made before last spring, some of it coming, according to the NBC News exec and writer, "through various finagling . . . from inside China."

So far, NBC says, there has been no pressure from anybody in this country to stop the China show. As a matter of fact, nobody at the web ever said that they expected pressure, but since a certain of pressure—fore or aft of the show—is seemingly par for the "White Paper" course, it's safe to assume that some NBC execs anticipate more of the same as the result of airing a program on China, considering that feelings here about Red China are running pretty high.

Accurate Reporting Service Folding In Music Biz Shift From Plug to Disk

After some 30 years of servicing the music business, radio and later tv, ad agencies, sponsors et al., Martin Alexander admits that he is compelled to fold his longtime Accurate Reporting Service. This was a song logging service on radio (later tv) performances. Accurate is discontinuing as of Jan. 20.

It flourished in the era of the band plugs, the radio "wires" into the sundry hotels, and in a period when "remotes" from location name orchestra locations and national hookups could help "make" a song.

This dates back to the 1920s, when payola again came to the fore because it actually was an extension of an even earlier subsidy by the music publishers, with cutins to vaude and musicomedy headliners and song stylists; payments for gowns or special scenery, and even flat $25-$50 weekly fees so long as a "plug" ballad remained in the act. Music publishers, for that reason, maintained a string of branch offices across the land to check up on this or that plug and see if the song was still "in" when they opened at the sundry Orpheum, Keith, Pantages and kindred circuit houses. With the band vogue the leaders and certain singers became cut-ins and suddenly blossomed as songwriters although there were quite a few who genuinely authored tunes or lyrics.

As the disk jockey took over as the song exploitation keynoter, the value of Alexander's Accurate Reporting Service was minimized but continued. He was also bucking the "Peatman sheet" (Prof. John G. Peatman, of CCNY, who also logged current pop and standard performances on radio and tv, and broke them down into the two categories).

The rest is music history—both ASCAP and BMI get their performance logs from all their licensees. With the second consent decree for the American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers, the current plug took on added values to the writer and publisher, as was true from the beginning with Broadcast Music Inc.

All this tended to water down Alexander's rating service value and so did his subscriptions. Finally he told the music trade, agencies et al. that it just wasn't worthwhile maintaining his monitoring staff. Most, frankly, stated that, in light of the development of the music plugging system, the several hundred dollars per annum didn't make it worthwhile. Paradoxically, one or two insist that they "can't see how the music business can do without it."

Kidisks, Dubbed as An 'Automatic Grandmother,' Boom German Wax Sales

Frankfurt, Jan. 2.

An odd Christmas jukebox assortment which has been dubbed the "automatic grandmother" is credited with booming sales for the record industry in Germany and Italy. For the first time in these countries, children's fairy tales and special Christmas songs and stories for youngsters have been put on record players in many restaurants and cafes.

The babysitter shortage, made more difficult by the country's acute labor dearth, has meant that more and more parents are taking the children along on shopping sprees, and on afternoons and evenings out in the locales.

And so the "automatic grandmothers" spread the entertainment for the kiddies, while the older ones look after themselves.

It's estimated that this year's record sales in West Germany will reach a high of 75,000,000 platters, a hefty increase over the 60,000,000 that moved over the counter in 1960.

Several firms brought out records slanted especially for the Christmas trade. Among them were a disk by Serge Jaroff and his Cossack choir singing Christmas songs in Germany, and a Caterina Valente waxing of "Silent Night" in Italian. Latter tune has had a big sale with the thousands of Italian laborers in Germany to help out with the employment situation.

ATLANTIC'S MONTEL DEAL

Atlantic Records has worked out a deal with Montel Records to handle national distribution of the latter label's disk, "Lonely Man" by Dale Houston. The disk will remain on Montel.

Atlantic is planning a campaign for the platter with Larry Maxwell, Norman Rubin, Moe Shulman, Red Baldwin and Joe Galkin on the road pushing it.

Maestro Group's Briefing Session

The Orchestra Leaders of Greater New York, a group of maestros within Local 802, American Federation of Musicians, who are waging a court fight against the union over salary taxes and other points, is holding a meeting for "a selected group of leaders" this evening (Wed.) in the Terrace Room of the Hotel New Yorker.

Among speakers at the meet will be Godfrey P. Schmidt, attorney for the OLOGNY, who has been conducting the organization's case for employer status. Topics to be discussed will concern the temporary injunctions against the 1½% Local 802 tax on salaries, the 10% traveling surcharge, the $1 per man welfare plan and the pending antitrust action against 802 and the AFM.

The relations between orchestra leaders and the union and the ramifications of the court orders and the January Federal Court trial which may establish and settle the issues and relationships between the union and the orch leaders will also be analyzed.

SYNTHETIC AUGMENTS ITS CUTRATE LINES

Synthetic Plastics Record Corp. has added two new labels to its string of cutrate lines. They are Guest Star Records and Diplomat Records.

The Guest Star label is pegged to the cutrate releasing of disks waxed by guest name artists. The first set of releases on the handle will be released next week and will feature such performers as Pearl Bailey, Errol Garner, Count Basie, the Dukes of Dixieland, Jimmie Rodgers, Tito Puente, Julius La Rosa and others. There will be 10 LPs in the label's first output.

Diplomat is also debuting in January. Its initial release will contain waxings by Enoch Light, Jose Melis and Enzo Stuarti and will also contain a Twist package. According to Ira L. Moss, executive v.p. of Synthetic Plastics, the Diplomat label will gradually replace the company's Promenade and Pirouette lines for more streamlining of the diskery's operations. Synthetic Plastic also produces the Peter Pan label.

Jazz Fest Drops 750G Action Vs. Newport, R.I., Over Gig Cancellations

Newport, R.I., Jan. 2.

Newport Jazz Festival Inc., is dropping its $750,000 damage suit against the city of Newport as a result of cancellation of two concerts of the 1960 festival, following the beer can riot.

The Festival directors, prexy Louis L. Lorillard said, have asked their attorney, Morris Kirsner, to withdraw the suit "because they feel that now nothing can be gained except more ill will and further bad publicity."

Withdrawal of the action is seen as relieving the friction between the Jazz Festival group and the city. Last summer, the jazz bash was produced by Sid Bernstein and John Drew Jr., under the banner of Music at Newport. It was the first year since its inception that the festival had been produced by a group other than the Lorillard headed organization, of which George Wein is producer director.

No announcement has yet been made as to who gets the 1962 jazz bash.

30% Pay Boost Averts Strike Of P.R. Musicians

San Juan, P.R., Jan. 2.

A verbal agreement was reached last week between hotels and nightclubs and the local musicians' union, which had threatened a general walkout at the San Juan Intercontinental Hotel on Dec. 29 in demand for higher salaries.

The agreement was reached after a three-and-a-half-hour meeting between the hotelmen and Abraham Pena, president of Local 468, AFM. The Flamboyan Club was also represented, along with hotel clubs La Concha, Caribe, Tropicoro, Fiesta Room and Voodoo Room.

The hotelmen agreed to a three-year contract providing minimum salaries of $108 weekly the first year, $118 the second year, and $126 on the third.

The current minimum is $83 a week, but most musicians reportedly had been earning more than this.

Jimmy Cairns Retiring As BMI Chi Office Head

Chicago, Jan. 2.

Jimmy Cairns, who has headed the Chi office of Broadcast Music Inc. since its inception nearly 22 years ago, will be retired by the firm in January at the age of 65. Stan Myers will assume charge of BMI activities here.

Cairns will affiliate himself with Janjo Music, a publishing and talent management firm headed by Don Talty.

Livingston, Bonbright New Cap Chiefs As Co. Halves Corporate Structure

MGM'S PREMIUM MGR.

Paul Livert, show biz vet with a background in premium sales and merchandising, has joined MGM/Verve/Cub as premium merchandising manager. He will be responsible for premium tie-ins with nationally advertised products for the lines.

He will be headquartered in New York.

Am-Par Alters Corporate Title

Am-Par Record Corp., the diskery subsid of American Broadcasting-Paramount Theatres, has changed its corporate title to ABC-Paramount Records Inc. Latter is the name of the outfit's flagship label. The Am-Par name will no longer be used, according to the president Sam H. Clark, but the firm is retaining the rights to the name for an indefinite period of time.

Clark relates that the change was brought about when it no longer became necessary for the outfit to work under the Am-Par name. Previously, because of production and distribution holdings in the overall AB-PT structure, the name Am-Par had been set as the diskery title. A realignment of these interests, however, no longer makes this necessary.

Clark says that it had always seemed better to bring the company under the ABC-Par banner because of the confusion the two names caused but that it wasn't possible until now. Edith Schaffer, attorney and secretary of ABC-Par, handled the legal details for the switch. The change of title does in no way affect the diskery's operation, distribution included, except that all business will be conducted under the ABC-Par banner rather than Am-Par.

MRS. PAT BALLARD TO MAKE U.S. HOME AGAIN

Mrs. Pat (Hilde) Ballard, widow of the songsmith, has decided that she "is too much 100% American" and is returning from Baden-Baden to resume residence in the States. When the author-composer died suddenly last year she rejoined some of her family in Germany, where they are in small industry, manufacturing, etc.

While abroad Mrs. Ballard placed several of her husband's song manuscripts with Chappell's in Munich. In the U. S. he was chiefly associated with Edwin H. Morris Music which published Ballard's smash "Mister Sandman" and other songs.

Mrs. Ballard is returning Feb. 4 on the SS America and will stay again at the Hotel Madison, New York, which was long their Gotham base when not in their Troy, Pa., home.

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Alan W. Livingston is the new top man at Capitol Records Inc., second only in responsibility and authority to prexy and cofounder Glenn E. Wallichs. The scope of Livingston's new domain embraces diskery's worldwide operations, including its phonograph and accessories business.

The move is part of company reshuffle to enhance its market position in both the record and electronic industries by dividing its existing corporate structure into two complete business groups: Records & Phonographs, to be headed by v.p. Livingston; and Mail Order & Electronics, to be headed by veepee Daniel C. Bonbright.

Livingston, until now Cap's vice president for creative services, will now additionally be responsible for all company sales, merchandising, studio and international operations pertaining to the record, phonograph and accessories business.

Bonbright's Sphere

Bonbright, previously the disk company's vice president for administration and finance, will be responsible for all of the company's mail order activities, including the Capitol and Angel Record Clubs, as well as for all of Capitol's electronics companies, owned and to be acquired. Cap's present electronics subsidiary is EMI/US.

Wallichs also indicated that additional exec personnel changes and additions may be expected. However, he confined himself to the following statement: "With the growth of Capitol's business and our company's diversification into electronics, mail order, home instruments and other products and services, we have felt the need to streamline our corporate organization and take fuller advantage of our management resources in order to meet the challenges of today's highly competitive market.

"Capitol is preparing to meet this challenge by 1) welding its management manpower and resources into a fighting team capable of expanding its position in the record industry through improved product, marketing and efficiency; and 2) by concentrating its management and expanding its use of resources in the electronics business in a balanced relationship with EMI (Electric & Musical Industries)."

Livingston's Duties

Livingston will now call the shots over the record, phonograph manufacturing, sales, merchandising, studio and internal operations. In short, he will direct all

Mottola's 'Strum-Along,' Tokens' 'Lion,' Shore's 'Down Home' Top New LP's

TONY MOTTOLA: "STRING BAND STRUM-ALONG" (Command). There doesn't seem to be any stopping producer Enoch Light when it comes to capitalizing on sound. This time out, he's blending guitars, mandolins, ukuleles and banjos on a string of happy swinging standards and it adds up to solid enjoyment for the audio contingent. Tony Mottola supplies the captivating plucking lead and he's followed by a bunch of boys who know their way around. "Tip Toe Through the Tulips." "Bye Bye Blackbird," "June Night," "Carolina In The Morning" and "Ain't She Sweet" are just some of the tunes that sustain this package's free-wheeling glow.

THE TOKENS: "THE LION SLEEPS TONIGHT" (RCA Victor). This combo, which was launched as a rock 'n' roll outfit, hit the jackpot in the folk idiom with its version of "Wimoweh," newly titled as "The Lion Sleeps Tonight." From there, these Brooklyn youngsters have dipped into a repertory of traditional tunes with solid results. Their offbeat harmonizing style is used very effectively on the title tune, "Jamaica Farewell," a jungle number and assorted other oldies.

DINAH SHORE: "DINAH DOWN HOME" (Capitol). To Dinah Shore, Dixieland is "Down Home" and that's the beat concentration in this package. She goes from swinging Dixieland to slow Dixieland with a vocal grace that's quite appealing and will make lots of programmers happy. The singer gets plenty of help from the expertly fashioned arrangements by Jack Marshall. The songs are of such standard vintage as "Way Down Yonder in New Orleans," "Carolina in the Morning," "Down Home Rag," "Do You Know What It Means to Miss New Orleans" and the like.

DAVE GRUSIN: "SUBWAYS ARE FOR SLEEPING" (Columbia). Dave Grusin is a jazz newcomer to the Columbia fold and makes a fine impresh with his keyboard workover of Jule Styne's "Subways Are for Sleeping" legituner score. Styne has supplied some bright melodies and Grusin develops them with a Steinway finesse that will get him good programming display. He's accompanied by Don Lammond on drums and Milt Hinton on bass.

OSCAR PETERSON-RAY BROWN-ED THIGPEN: "THE TRIO" (Verve). Recorded at a jazz spot in Chicago, this set captures Oscar Peterson's trio in a free-flowing, toe-tapping groove. This is a sample of swinging modern jazz spotlighting Peterson on piano, Ray Brown on bass and Ed Thigpen on drums. Longrunning numbers include such standouts as "I've Never Been In Love Before," "Chicago," "The Night We Called It A Day" and "Whisper Not."

WOODY WOODBURY: "SALOONANTICS" (Stereoddities). Florida comedian Woody Woodbury has his fourth LP in this outing which was recorded live at the Bahama Hotel, Fort Lauderdale. It should please his fans and others in that it contains a clever assortment of generally amusing gags and stories and even a song. The comic's delivery is nicely suited for waxing in that his diction is clear and nicely phrased so that the listener has a chance to follow the gags and plots to advantage. His material is the usual mixture of cleanliness and off-color topics but there isn't any offensive stuff in the package. It's an entertaining and well-handled set.

LOUIS PRIMA: "DOIN' THE TWIST" (Dot). In the torrent of Twist disks, this album floats along on the ebullient vocal style of Louis Prima and Sam Butera's Witnesses, a solid rocking combo. The Twist beat isn't the most varied and doesn't wear well over a dozen tunes. But Prima has mixed it up with tunes like "Marie," "Alright, Okay, You Win," "Route 66," and "The Glow Worm" while Butera's combo does a couple of instrumentals not strictly in The Twist tempo.

IRVING FIELDS: "TWISTING" (Everest). Everest Records' entry In The Twist sweepstakes features Copa lounge trio leader Irving Fields and a group working over several tunes in the terp craze groove. The package is somewhat different than most Twist LPs in that it has a mellower tone, more in a society vein. The beat is there, however, if more muffled than most teen-Twist platters so the overall effect is one of a bridgegap somewhere between the hard rocking teen sound and the softer, more subtle society tone. As such it probably has more appeal for the new adult recruits to The Twist than the teeners, although there is something for them here too.

"THE COLORFUL PERCUSSIONS OF ARTHUR LYMAN" (Life). Arthur Lyman's combo from the Hawaiian Islands here utilizes its skill with a variety of percussion instruments, such as vibes, marimbas and piano, on an excellent group of songs. A big sound is generated by this quartet on numbers like "Exodus." "Never On Sunday," "I Talk To The Trees," "Moanin'." "Red Sails In The Sunset" and several island songs.

"PLAY AND SING ALONG TOO" (Ad Lib). This is a package with a gimmick. Aimed at the kiddies, the album contains four cut-out "bumble bees" (pre-fabricated instruments into which one hums to produce a sound) and features "Uncle" Clyde Sechler holding a play and sing session with a childrens' chorus and, of course, the kids at home. It's a cute idea, assembled well with several folk and familiar tunes brightly and crisply arranged and conducted by Geogre Seravo. There are games for the kids, conducted by Sechler, and the chorus on the disk performs nicely, backed by an eight-piece group. Unfortunately, however, the "bumble bees" aren't what they're cracked up to be musically, but there's still some fun to be had with the platter.

FATHER JOSEPH DUSTIN: "MORE SONGS FATHER TAUGHT ME" (Riverside). A Catholic clergyman from Detroit, Father Joseph Dustin brings some more of his swinging banjo talents to another collection of oldies. Backed by a nifty rhythm group, Father Dustin's banjo works out colorfully on tunes like "Sheik of Araby," "Shine On, Harvest Moon," "In A Little Spanish Town," a Stephen Foster medley and "Sweet Georgia Brown," among others.

ERIK DARLING: "TRUE RELIGION" (Vanguard). A member of The Weavers, Erik Darling is a sensitive folk instrumentalist and singer who rates this solo showcase. In this collection, Darling plays varied banjos and guitars as accompaniment to his soft-voiced renditions of songs like "True Religion," "Woody Knows Nothing," "Virgin Mary," "Frankie and Johnny" and "Lonesome Valley," among others.

EWAN MacCOLL: "BRITISH ARMY SONGS" (Washington). This is a fresh idea for a folksong collection. Ewan MacColl, a Scot singer with a vigorous style, delivers these informal songs of British troopers with a colorful and sometimes sentimental lilt. The songs, which are not generally known in the U.S., include "Bless 'Em All," "The Dying Soldier," "When This Ruddy War Is Over," "On The Move" and "The Ghost Army of Korea."

DICK RIDGELY & BUD SMITH: "SUMMER IN SOUTHHAMPTON" (Charles). Dick Ridgely is a drummer who also owns a steak joint in Water Mill, L.I. He combines both avocations by playing at his bistro nightly with Bud Smith on piano and organ. In addition, Ridgely also writes tunes and this album showcases both his drumming and writing abilities nicely. Put out as a limited edition (available at the club or by mail), the platter has 14 tunes, five of which were penned by the versatile Ridgely who is accompanied effectively by Smith. It is a well-rounded set which shows off their talents well, featuring a solid and flexible beat and pleasant sound.

THE OLYMPICS: "PARTY TIME" (Arvee). This rocking combo fits right into the current twist craze. In fact it's hardhitting and swinging rhythms turned up in a powerful hoofing hit, "Hully Gully," a couple of years ago. In this offering, the quartet ranges over the field from the Madison, the Coochie Coo, the Cha Cha and the Twist. It moves all the way.

Longplay Shorts

United Artists Records will introduce its new "Sweet Sixteen For '62" plan at a series of three regional meetings to be held in New York, Chicago and L.A. this week. JOE HENDERSON . . . . BABY DON'T LEAVE ME
(Todd) . . . . . Right Now

Joe Henderson's "Baby Don't Leave Me" (Copar-Forrest†) should swing out of left field into spinning contention because of the insinuating vocal attack on a persuasively attractive ballad. "Right Now" (Copar-Forrest†) gets by via its interesting vocal style but it'll be tough going in the spinning circuits because of its overly slow mood.

MGM Adding New Album Lines in '62 To Meet Needs for Steady LP Flow

New album lines will be the key to MGM Records' activities in 1962. In addition to the Verve and Cub lines, which are its subsid labels, MGM is taking on the handling of Charlie Parker Records, a jazz label, and Choreo Records, a new diskery set up by Fred Astaire.

According to Arnold Maxin, MGM president, the distributors need a continuity of album product and "our own production problems can't satisfy all their needs." He claims that it doesn't cost any more to handle new lines and in this way the company can sustain a flow of album distribution to meet current market needs.

In addition to the album push for the coming year, Maxin is planning a buildup of Verve as a pop singles line apart from its already established jazz album image.

Although album sales now bring in between 80% and 85% of the disk industry's total revenue, Maxin does not plan to de-emphasize his singles output. "The buildup of new singles artists remains just as important as ever," he says, "because they can eventually be developed as potent album sellers." Connie Francis, who started out a pop singles artist, is now racking up hefty album sales for MGM, not only in the U.S., but all over the world.

For the coming year, Maxin is also planning closer affiliation between the Metro picture company and his record operation. Already in the works are disk tieins for such major pix as "Mutiny On The Bounty," "The Four Horsemen," and "How The West Was Won." Maxin is even projecting into 1963 for diskery acitivities with the "Brothers Grimm" pic. He's also planning to reactivate the label's kiddie line. This will be a re-packaging job of MGM's old Lion line.

Giuffre's Jazz Trio May Be Far-Out for O'seas Auds But Take's Groovy

Frankfurt, Jan. 2.

The free form jazz trio of Jimmy Giuffre's drew considerably mixed reactions during its recent one-night stands in Austria and Germany. At every performance, a handful of listeners who obviously didn't dig the abstract and unusual jazz walked out. But plenty stayed, and more came, and the net result was that the Giuffre month-long tour proved a financial success.

Unusual in this part of Europe is that jazz artists from the U. S. who arrive here are already well known to local jazz audiences. But the Giuffre group, with Giuffre on clarinet, Canadian Paul Bely at the piano and Steve Swallow on bass, is a new name here, and the music they play is certainly not a type to which European jazz fans have been exposed.

As one American critic in Germany, Dick Gitlin, wrote for "Stars and Stripes," "The trio's experimental work is shockingly different from other forms of jazz. It reaches back to draw from the chamber music sounds of such as Bartok and Bach and adds flourishes all its own as well as liberal improvisation."

Fact that the tour paid off, though, proves that the tickets can be sold here and newcomers can find acceptance in Europe. The group is slated for a return tour in 1962.

Miron's Cultural Mission

Issachar Miron, vice-president of ACUM, Israeli performing rights society, is due in New York early this month for an extended visit concerning a project to provide a showcase in the U.S. for Israel's musical activities.

Miron's visit is not an ACUM mission, but one of national concern to forge new cultural links between Israel and the U.S.

Limeliters Thin 5G, S.F.

San Francisco, Jan. 2.

Limeliters grossed a weak $5,000 in two afternoon children's concerts at Berkeley Community Theatre Friday (29) and Frisco's Masonic Auditorium Saturday (30).

Disks' 'Summit' Talks

The disk industry apparently is out to put an end to the Cold War on its own. A couple of weeks ago Columbia issued a Jimmy Dean disk called "Dear Ivan," in which Dean delivered a plea to a Soviet citizen for peace, better understanding and belief in God.

Now, Capitol is coming up with a female counterpart to the Dean disking. It's Jeanne Black's reading of "A Letter to Anya." Against the background of "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," the thrush makes a plea to an imaginary Russian girl for international peace and co-existence, pointing out that, despite the impending shadow of thermo-nuclear war, the U.S. and Russia can find a new path of mutual understanding.

Princeton Revue Settles AFM Tiff

Cincinnati, Jan. 2.

Settlement of a dispute over standby pay for 12 members of Local 1, AFM, averted interference to the Princeton Triangle Club revue performance in 2,500-seat indie Taft auditorium tonight (2).

The Cincy Princeton committee chairman, Craig Nalen, and Eugene Frey, union attorney, said the agreement donates money normally paid for extra musicians to the Fine Arts Fund, which supports the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Summer Opera and Art Museum.

The Princeton troupe, under yellow card arrangement with the stagehands union for the annual holidays tour, includes an orchestra in the current edition. Nalen contended that a standby combo was not required for overture and intermission music. He said the Taft contract called for union ticket handlers.

The show raises funds for Princeton scholarships.

MUZAK SPREADS INTO WELSH, SCOT MARKETS

London, Jan. 2.

Muzak now has a daily audience of more than 1,000,000 in the United Kingdom, asserts company exec Robin McDowall. After two years of operations in Britain, the firm's first phase of expansion is complete, he says, and every town in England with a population of more than 100,000 has access to Muzak.

Already the company (for which Associated TeleVision holds the British franchise) has started to spread into Wales. Cardiff is the first Welsh city to get the planned music treatment and it's slated to move into Scotland later.

Chancellor Sets Distrib Deals in U.K. & Orient

Chancellor Records will be distributed throughout the U.K. by Pye Records of England. The label has also set licensees in Hong Kong and Japan.

Colonial Records will handle Chancellor product in Hong Kong and Yamaha will do likewise in Japan. All three companies are independent licensees and will cover their specific areas. Chancellor had previously been handled by EMI and its affiliates in these territories.

According to Rocco B. Ochuida, the label's foreign manager, the move was made because Chancellor's managerial department has sent several of its artists such as Fabian and Frankie Avalon on foreign personal appearance tours and plans to do more of this in 1962. It was felt that independent diskeries overseas would be more beneficial to the company in this program.

As a further development of the policy, the diskery is also dickering with companies for representation in Australia, New Zealand, India and South America.

Decca Releasing 21 New Albums, Introing 7 Phono Models in Jan. Promotion

Decca Records is releasing 21 new Decca and Coral albums in its January promotion. The drive also calls for introduction of seven new phonograph models and a push on six recently-released singles on the Decca, Coral and Brunswick labels.

The January promotion will be the first of scheduled monthly promos through 1962. The entire Decca/Coral/Brunswick catalog is being made available to the trade under an incentive plan for dealers along with other sales aids provided through Decca field reps.

In the pop genre, the diskery is releasing waxings by Burl Ives and several debut platters like Art Mooney's first Decca LP, Cab Calloway's initial Coral platter and a first Decca showcasing for Charles K. L. Davis. In the country and folk area, releases are on tap from Bill Anderson, Billy Grammer, the Ivy League Trio and the Wilburn Bros.

In other categories, a new group called the Castaways will debut with some calypso treatments and the Melbourne Highland Pipe Band will also bow. Dance packages have been prepared by Jan Garber and Bert Kaempfert. Decca's organ output will be increased by a waxing by Al Bollington, and Vincente Gomez will offer a Flamenco guitar platter. Pop violinist Dick Kessner has a release as does Liberace.

Classical releases include performances by Morini and Firkusny, Ruggerio Ricci and the debut of the Original Piano Quartet. Decca/Coral/Brunswick singles include outings by Brenda Lee, Jackie Wilson, Bert Kaempfert, Pete Fountain, Kitty Wells and Webb Pierce.

ASCAP Wins Court OK to Negotiate Renewal License With TV B'casters

Having received a deposit of tv rights from 85% of the publisher membership and more than 80% of the writer membership last week, the American Society of Composers, Authors & Publishers is now authorized to negotiate a renewal license with the broadcasters.

This came on the heels of a denial by N.Y. Federal Judge Sylvester Ryan of an injunction requested by The All-Industry Television Station Music-License Committee to restrain and enjoin ASCAP and its members from refusing to exercise authorizations it has received from its members to issue licenses to the petitioners and from otherwise interfering with or restricting the granting of such licenses.

More specifically, according to Judge Ryan, the Committee had sought as interim injunctive relief to set aside a resolution of ASCAP's board of directors providing that the authorizations received by ASCAP be held in escrow until like authorizations are executed and delivered by a total of at least 80% of the membership. (The broadcasters were seeking an interim rate of 75% of current rates.)

Judge Ryan further stated, "It appears that the requirement that 80% of the membership deposit authorization with ASCAP before any television performance licenses will issue has been in effect since 1948, when television rights were for the first time licensed on a fee basis; and that the parties to this proceeding have been operating under television performance licenses for the last four years.

"A major problem now presented in negotiations for renewal of the existing licenses arises from the fact that petitioners now seek a type of license on an interim and final basis quite different from that which they have had in the past; that is, they seek and have asked for a blanket license limited only to the television programs which each station originates locally and excluding those programs filmed or taped by third party producers.

"As to these latter programs, petitioners seek no license but would have each ASCAP member individually and directly license the producer to permit broadcasts by the petitioners. This exclusion, it appears, would ultimately embrace a substantial number of programs, and such a license the ASCAP members appear to be unwilling to grant."

In holding that the "status quo" should be maintained until the determination of a new license, Judge Ryan said, "No irreparable harm is threatened petitioners, for ASCAP is financially responsible and the ultimate determination will be retroactive to Jan. 1, 1962.

The hearing on the new rates has been set for Feb. 14.

Disneyland's Distribs

Disneyland/Vista Records has made two changes in its distributor setup for 1962. The switches affect the New Orleans and Houston areas.

As negotiated by Dick Kline, assistant to the label's national sales manager Phil Sammeth, the N.O. market will be handled by Henry Hildebrand's All South Distributing Corp. A new firm headed by Bob West and Hildebrand, Texas Record Distributors, will distribute Disneyland/Vista product in the Houston area.

Xmas Disk Sales Perk British Biz

London, Jan. 2.

Christmas disk biz is so active, say British diskeries, that they expect total 1961 sales to be more than $7,000,000 over last year which saw the record makers earn a boff $81,000,000. According to a report from the Board of Trade, October sales were valued at $4,500,000, repping 3% more than the same month in 1960.

Domestic sales, at $1,900,000, were up by 11%. But exports took a tumble and, at $632,800, were 27% less than for the previous year.

Production of the four-track 45 rpm disks in October was 5% more and some 2,128,000 albums were produced, a rise of 21% over last year. Over the 10-month period, production of both the 45 rpm and albums rose, says Bot.

Return of the 'Leer-ics'?

By DON MORRISON

Minneapolis Star columnist Don Morrison's observations below (Dec. 18, 1962) speak for themselves:

If the bluecoats and bluenoses are shopping around for something to suppress, now that the heat is off "Tropic of Cancer," I have a dandy for them.

This moral menace is worse than Henry Miller's novel, because its consumers do not even have to be literate to come under its evil sway; in fact, I suspect that few of them are.

And, it is incomparably more subversive to juvenile morals than Henry Miller (whose metaphysical blather would drive a teenager back to Mad magazine long before he reached the first erotic passage in "Cancer"). That of which I speak is aimed specifically and seductively at the minor child. Further, it is all-persuasive, invading the pink-and-white, dimity-flounced boudoirs of every transistorized maiden in the community.

I speak of the teenage Top 20 of popular songs. I do not refer to their quality as music, unspeakable as that may be, but to the lyric.

I chanced to hear one of these songs the other day. I am sure that it is played a dozen times a day by those local radio stations that turn a dubious buck by pandering to the tastes of cretins.

In this song, some pimpled Lothario was gloating to his girl friend, and I quote the lyrics verbatim: "What would they do; what would they say? They think that we're in school all day, but we're making love."

Now, most popular songs are about love. In my day, however, it was love, licit or illicit, being made on the Isle of Capri or in Blue Hawaii or South of the Border.

Because of the exotic locales, I always assumed it was love being made by people with the price of rail or steamship passage, that is, adults.

I cannot recall being incited musically to truancy. I cannot recall any song that hymned amorous dalliance among and between adolescents.

The above lyric so fired my curiosity that I went to a record shop and, blushing furiously, asked to hear some of the current teen-age hits. Most of them were below the belt.

One roundelay goes as follows: "Wake up, little Susie; we've both been sound asleep. Wake up, little Susie and weep. The movie's over, it's 4 o'clock and we're in trouble deep. Whatta we gonna tell your momma? Whatta we gonna tell your pop?"

Another teenage song was husked out by a young woman with a voice so breathlessly sensual that one syllable of it overheard on Hennepin Av. would cause Pat Walling to unloose a veritable barrage of cannon.

Interspersed with ecstatic moans, she sang: "Teach me, Tiger, how to kiss you. My lips belong to you, but teach me first what to do. Touch me, Tiger, when I'm close to you," etc.

Obviously, this is a girl who can't wait to get to the Isle of Capri—or even for school to let out.

Elvis Presley has a new song called "Little Sister, Don't Do What Your Big Sister Done."

This sounds like pious, if ungrammatical advice, save that Mr. Presley happens to be urging the junior female not to kiss him and then run away as her elder sibling did—or done.

If Henry Miller's novels are pornographic, then surely these recordings are pornophonic. Some are even stereopornophonic, which is twice as bad.

We may soon have songs celebrating every aspect of juvenile misconduct. Why neglect teen-age narcotics addiction?

I'm roughing out a number that could shoot right to the top. It is called: "I Loved that Girl, I'd Hate to Lose Her 'Cause She's a Pusher and I'm a User."

Britain Will Follow U.S. Trend Toward Indie Disk Pkgers.: Franklyn Boyd

London, Jan. 2.

Back from New York where he's been seeking American songs for British artists, Franklyn Boyd, a pubber in the Belinda group, predicts that Britain will follow the U.S. trend toward independent a&r men who freelance material to record companies. Already, he notes, Britain has latched onto one recent Yank idea, namely, signing of writers to specialize for one artist.

"We're usually about a year behind the States," says Boyd, "and I'm sure independent record producing will grow in Britain. In fact, at least one freelance is doing this successfully now." Boyd sees no reason why there shouldn't be others.

Another current facet of the U.S. market that may rub off in Britain is the trend towards younger a&r men, says the publisher. "Over there," he points out, "the younger element of the a&r fraternity is growing and getting big results."

The document was awarded to Charles by the Academie de Disque Francais for his ABC-Paramount waxing, "Genius Plus Soul Equals Jazz," the only non-French jazz disk to be so acknowledged. The document was relayed to Sam H. Clark, ABC-Par prexy, from the line's Paris outlet, Disques Vega, to which the award was presented.

of Capitol's affairs other than its electronics business.

According to Wallichs, the general business policies of the two separate operations will be determined by an executive committee consisting of Livingston, Bonbright and himself. The new organization goes into effect today (Tues.).

Livingston joined Cap in 1946 and made his first big step when he headed the children's record operation. He made a solid impression by developing the successful "Bozo" series and then became artists & repertoire chief. He won veepee stripes as head of album production in 1949 and in '51 was upped to veepee in charge of a&r.

NBC lured him from the Capitol fold in '56, offering the dual exec capacities of prexy of California National Productions and v.p. in charge of Coast programming. He returned to disk company in October, '60.

Bonbright joined Capitol in '46 as secretary and counsel. In '51, he was named veepee for finance and in '55 he was upped to veepee for administration and finance. In March, '61, he was named to serve as Cap corporate veepee in charge of the diskery's electronics activities, in addition to his other responsibilities.

Promoter Hal Leventhal Stashes His Xmas Loot: $20,578 From 3 N.Y. Gigs

It was a merry Christmas for Harold Leventhal, folk manager and concert promoter. On Saturday (23) he presented three New York concerts, one at Town Hall and two at Carnegie Hall for a combined gross of $20,578. Of the three, two were SRO and the third, an 11:30 p.m. Carnegie stint, missed by about 200 seats.

A combined attendance of 5,720 customers turned out for the sessions. The Town Hall outing featured the Modern Jazz Quartet, with guest appearances by Curtis Fuller, Jimmy Heath and Freddy Hubbard. It was the group's first solo concert SRO date drawing 1,550 patrons for a gross of $4,918 with tickets scaled to a $3.85 top.

Both Carnegie shows featured the Seeger family (Pete, Peggy and Mike) and the New Lost City Ramblers. The first session, which began at 8:30, went SRO, drawing 2,185 customers with ducats scaled to a $3.50 top. The second session pulled 1,985 customers, with tickets scaled to a $3 top. Total gross for both Carnegie shows was $15,660.

Leventhal leaves New York today (Wed.) for a three-week European trip to London, Paris, Milan and Rome to set concert and tv appearances for Leon Bibb, versRobert DeCormier and the Weavers, all of whom he manages. He will also investigate possibilities of setting up publishing outlets there for his Sanga Music, in which he's involved with David Platz of Ludlow Music, and Fall River Music, both BMI folk music publishing outfits.

Nikki Price, formerly Jeannie Johnson and "Miss Chicago 1955," has been signed by Columbia Records. Her first album will be cut this month. She's appeared on tv in filmed commercials and in singing groups on several occasions.

Prestige: Eddie Kirkland

Eddie "Blues Boy" Kirkland has been signed by Prestige Records. The singer has already cut several sides for Prestige, the first two of which will be released on the diskery's Tru-Sound label. Kirkland toured with bluesman John Lee Hooker for seven years before starting out on his own about three years ago. In addition to singing, he plays harmonica and guitar, the latter a complex home-made instrument.

Cadence: Jean Thomas and Willy Wills

Cadence Records has inked pop chirper Jean Thomas and pop/rhythm and blues singer Willy Wills. Both will begin waxing for the label in January, primarily as singles artists but will also cut albums if the occasion arises.

Epic: George Maharis

George Maharis, singer-actor currently costarring on the vid-series "Route 66," has been signed by Epic Records. He will cut his first platter soon for early 1962 release. In addition to his current tv stint, Maharis has been active off-Broadway and on other tv shows as well as films. His show biz career was begun, however, as a band singer, although he has never cut a disk until now.

Capitol: George Chakiris and Kathy Linden

Actor George Chakiris and chirp Kathy Linden have been inked to Capitol Records pacts. Chakiris will cut his first outing, an LP, in February, with Dave Cavanaugh a&ring the session and Jack Marshall conducting the orch.

Miss Linden, who previously clicked on the Felsted label on a couple of waxings, will be under supervision of a&r producer Nick Venet. She has appeared on several network tv segs and played niteries.

Plaza: Ric Lance

Ric Lance, 18-year-old pop singer, has been inked by Plaza Records. His first waxing will be released this month. Next month he'll embark on a 21-state tour to promote his efforts.

Lotsa Discords Face Today's Tyro Jazz Singer, June Christy Asserts

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

Although long one of the leading jazz influenced chirpers, June Christy offers scant encouragement to those who might try to emulate her. "If I were starting today I would give up," said the pert, trombone voiced blond during a break in her six-week Nipponese tour. "I wouldn't know where to go or how to begin."

Miss Christy feels chances are fewer for the jazz singer launching a career today compared with her own experiences a couple decades ago.

"I have sympathy for those trying to start in the jazz field, particularly singers," Miss Christy opined. "Musicians can generally find a place to jam or someone to play with, but for a singer, there's little opportunity. Only two or three jazz bands are using singers and I don't know of any other way to get started," noted Miss Christy, who was catapulted to popularity during her eight years with the bands of Stan Kenton.

"The only other way a jazz singer might get started," she reflected, "is to get lucky with a first record. And that's difficult because the companies are out for hits with rock 'n' roll.

Urges TV Exposure

"It's almost impossible for a new jazz singer to find someone to give him a contract and exposure," Miss Christy continued. "If a singer is not particularly interested in jazz, there are still some opportunities. The way to learn and to get exposure would be on tv.

"And I feel sorry for new singers who come up with fast hits," she said. "They are not prepared. With one hit record, the singer gets hot and the club owners pay big salaries to sign him. But by the time the singer gets to a second club, the hit record has died. Yet the owner still has to pay the big salary. A lot of clubs have been ruined that way."

Here with husband Bob Cooper, an ex-Kentonite who swings a tenor saxophone, their eight-year-old daughter Shay and piano accompanist Ian Bernard, Miss Christy learned once more that the status of success does not insure smooth proceedings.

Once here, she was informed that her repertoire would have to be revised to include not only such identification songs as "Something Cool," "Midnight Sun," "How High the Moon" and "Wllow Weep for Me," but also to cover such songs of current interest in Japan as "Over the Rainbow," "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered" and "'S Wonderful."

"I came with my own library assuming they knew what they were buying," Miss Christy explained. "Then I had to learn a bunch of tunes in a hurry. Ian and Bob were kept busy writing arrangements. I wish we had been warned."

In the U.S., perhaps the greatest handicap for a singer of taste is the scarcity of good, new songs. "When we make an album, we try to get fresh material," Miss Christy noted. "At Capitol we have pretty much of a free hand. We'd like nothing better than new songs. But they're very difficult to find. An exception was a recent album of Christmas and New Year's songs I did called 'This Time of Year.'

"Generally," she continued, "if a writer brought in new, good songs, he probably would be refused. The a&r men are to be blamed. They are so concerned with hit records that there's hardly been a good hit in recent years. 'Misty' is all I can think of. The a&r men are going for the bad tunes which become hits. The good tunes either don't get written or get lost in the shuffle."

In Japan, except for having to revise her presentation, Miss Christy has encountered pleasant surprises. She said, "I thought the language barrier would be difficult, but I found that most Japanese singers work with English lyrics. And I've heard some very good ones.

"The musicians are absolutely fantastic. I have worked with three different big bands and found that after only one rehearsal, they play everything perfectly. You don't find that in the States. And the rhythm sections—drummers are always a problem when you go into a club—are equally good. I've had a series of good drummers here. I haven't run into any bad ones.

Mass. Okayed Unlicensed Bookers, Prober Charges in Resigning Post

Boston, Jan. 2.

The out-of-town booking and bypassing of licensed Massachusetts bookers and an unlicensed booking hassle broke open again here with the resignation of former booking agent Ben Ford Abrams, of Revere, investigator of theatrical booking practices for the state since 1957.

Abrams resigned in a letter of protest to Frank E. Giles, public safety commissioner. The former booker charged that Giles had permitted unlicensed agents in the state to book acts.

"I cannot stand by and see you as present commissioner of public safety make a farce of a business that required a lifetime of planning and supervision," he said in the letter.

"In the past two months," he added, "the illegal practice of allowing non-licensed agents to function within the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, with your knowledge and approval, has created chaos and confusion in an honorable profession."

Abrams said he was resigning so that "as a private citizen," he could continue to protect the 60-odd licensed theatrical booking agents in Massachusetts "against the unfair practices you have condoned."

As a booking agent, Abrams in 1946 sponsored the law which requires that theatrical agents be licensed. Since that time booking agents are required to pay a $200 license fee. The law also provides that to book entertainment in the state bookers must be domiciled in Massachusetts.

Abrams also claimed many flagrant cases of out of state bookers, mainly New York city bookers, who are bypassing local bookers completely and booking shows into the state directly from New York in violation of the Massachusetts law.

Abrams said he will return to the booking business with offices in New York and Boston the early part of the year.

Al Jolson's Alleged Son Plans Nitery Act Using Jolie's Songs & Billing

Chicago, Jan. 2.

Harry Brown, claiming to be the 49-year-old son of the late Al Jolson, is prepping an act based on Jolie's hits and will make a bid for the nitery circuit this spring. He is using the Al Jolson billing.

A mail piece, showing a picture of him in blackface, advertises this: "Son of late Al Jolson is now available for booking, singing songs that his father made famous."

Longdistanced at his home in Phoenix, Ariz., Brown said that he had not previously used the Jolson name because of an alleged agreement between his mother, Bessie Lee, and the star not to trade on his kinship while Jolson was alive. Brown said Miss Lee was Jolson's first wife and was married to him for a year in 1909-1910. (What doesn't add up is that, according to his own figures, Brown-Jolson should be 51 instead of the 49 he claims.)

Brown said that he had done some work as an emcee-comic-singer in small clubs during the '30s and '40s and for the past 10 years has been the part-owner of a restaurant. "Jolie was the greatest thing that ever happened to show business," Brown said, "and I wouldn't do anything to hurt his beloved memory. I'll never be as great as he was, but I'll be up there trying."

Brooklyn Spot's Names

The Town & Country Club, Brooklyn, which is going back to the name standard, has signed Abbe Lane-Xavier Cugat for a four-weeker starting May 4.

The nitery is currently operating on a weekend policy, but expects to open fulltime the latter part of January, with name acts on top.

K.C. Riviera Lists 126G Liabilities In B'ruptcy Petition

Kansas City, Jan. 2.

A voluntary petition in bankruptcy was filed by the Riviera Club Inc. in Federal Court here last Wednesday (27). The petition was signed by Smith F. Brandom Jr., president of the corporation which did business as the Cabaret Riviera.

The nightclub on the lower level of the Broadway-Valentine Shopping Centre opened with a flourish Sept. 8, and closed Dec. 19 with little warning. The papers listed liabilities of about $126,000, somewhat less than the $145,000 originally estimated.

Liabilities included $14,500 due Joe E. Lewis, who was the second of a two-week engagement when the club closed. The petition was filed by A. J. Granoff, attorney, and Charles C. Shafer Jr., a city councilman and a vice president of the club.

Henry E. Murphy, referee in bankruptcy, granted the club until Jan. 12 to file its bankruptcy schedule and statement of affairs. The amount of assets were not listed in the petition. George V. Aylward Jr. was appointed receiver.

CHARLES CORP. BUYS 2 CLEVE. JAZZ CLUBS

Cleveland, Jan. 2.

Kornman's Restaurant and Hickory Grill, two of Cleveland's most prosperous jazz clubs, have been acquired by Charles Corp., a national food services organization with a home base here, through an exchange of stock.

Both of the de luxe musical dining spots will operate as completely owned subsidiaries of the buyers, but no changes in policy or staff are being planned. Jules and William Weinberger, owners of the restaurants, were made vice presidents of the food company.

William will have charge of the Charles Corp. catering division and central commissary. His brother Jules was made responsible for company's overall food operation as well as its industrial and restaurant food services.

Kornman's Front Room has been showcasing such jazz attractions as Jimmy McPartland, Miami Beachcombers, Buddy Cole and current Playboys Quartet. Hickory, run by Jules Weinberger, also features jazz units ranging from Jack Teagarden to Muggsy Spanier and Red Allen in current engagement. Two-week stands also have been set by Hickory for Johnny "Scat" Davis Feb. 12 and Dizzy Gillespie, March 12.

TV's Hotel Test

The Statler-Hilton Hotel, N.Y., is receiving an experimental broadcast by the Telad Corp. which is transmitting through unused channels of the tv spectrum a program of information and features designed to appeal to hotel guests.

The hotel gets a program fitted to its specifications. When the service is fully developed, advertisers will be able to select a series of hotels or one hotel for commercials.

Twist to Stretch Borscht Belt Into More Shows, Predicts Charlie Rapp

The Twist will be a major ingredient in borscht belt entertainment this year, predicts Charlie Rapp who is the largest rest resort booker in the U. S. What's more, he believes, the Twist will be responsible for many hotels installing entertainment policies.

A hotel only has to run a Twist night, he said, and it will find that one night of entertainment isn't sufficient. It will go on to other show policies for other evenings. The hotel across the road will have to provide the same entertainment. Thus more shows will prevail in the Catskills, he prophesized.

However, it's not because of the Twist alone that the mountains will have more entertainment this year than last year, Rapp says. The major hotels in the area have been expanding. Some are building huge additions, others are adding theatres or niteries. The tendency is to increase not only in size but also the entertainment budget.

While the Concord and Grossinger's have been on a name policy, with the Concord spending the top dollar for acts, the other hotels will start using higher level names as well as some of the disk renowns in order to attract the monied as well as the more youthful clientele.

As hotels become larger, asserts Rapp, the more opulent their entertainment requirements will be. The acts will be a wedge to get into the same league of public acceptance as the two top hotels to the hill-country.

With more growth of entertainment in the mountains, the number of prime talents emerging from the area will be on the upbeat. The Catskills have always been considered a top developer of acts. They can count on at least one act a season. Totie Fields emerged last summer, and Jackie Mason came out the year before. The area, Rapp feels, will not go back to the era of social directors, not at least while hotels have to compete with inns having name acts.

Neither Snow Nor Etc. Stays Austin Mack From Leaving His K.C. Hotel

Kansas City, Jan. 2.

Getting out of town amidst the town's severe snowstorm Dec. 22 called for some imagination on the part of Austin Mack, pianist for Joe E. Lewis. Mack and his wife had reservations on a train to the Coast leaving here that evening. They had been here with Lewis at the hapless Cabaret Riviera which closed suddenly Dec. 19.

When the snow began to pile up around noon Friday, Mack phoned for a cab. When it was evident he would have no success at reserving one, he tried a limousine service, but that, too, was refused.

Following the suggestion of the limousine service, Mack telephoned an ambulfance company. He and his wife and five pieces of luggage were picked up by the vehicle at the Hyde Park Hotel. The Macks rode up front with the driver, while an attendant rode atop the baggage in the rear. The charge, $12.

Injured in Crash, Vocal Trio Leaves Scot Revue

Aberdeen, Scotland, Jan. 2.

The Mudlarks, British singing trio, withdrew here from the Donald Bros.' winter revue, "Christmas Crackers," as a result of an automobile accident in which the two male members of the three-some, Jeff and Fred Mudd, were badly injured.

Trio will not be able to fill dates until the end of January. The act's place in revue at His Majesty's Theatre here has been taken by The Beltones.

Mont'l Resumes Names

Montreal has resumed name bookings, but on a less frequent than when that city was one of the top nitery towns on the continent. Hildegarde has been set for the Ritz Carlton, Jan. 28, and Myron Cohen has been booked for El Morocco, April 21.

El Morocco, formerly one of the top nitery buyers, has been in near-retirement as a name dispensary.

Indpls. Agency Expands

Chicago, Jan. 2.

Ross W. Christena Associates, Indianapolis talent agency, is going into radio-tv commercials production and is opening a nightclub tours department.

Bandleader-jinglesmith Charles Holden has joined the firm to write commercials, and Maurice De Swert heads up the nitery tour.

Freedomland's Ad Budget

Freedomland will have an advertising budget of over $750,000 for the forthcoming season. This will be spent on newspapers, magazines, business publications, billboards, movie trailers, radio and television as well as direct mail.

Ad account for the Bronx amusement park will be handled by Cole Fischer & Rogow Inc.

Raze Ottawa's Fairmont Club for New Parkway

Ottawa, Jan. 2.

Onetime venerable nitery, the Fairmont Club, had been eyed by Montreal and Toronto interests for revival after it shuttered last fall when its liquor license was lifted by police. But hopes for the revival are gone.

The Fairmont is in the hands of building wreckers this week. The National Capital Commission bought the property for $88,000 and will turn it into part of NCC's already started parkway.

Ice Shows Slipping as Grosses of 3 Major Productions Take a 30% Slide

Ice shows, which have maintained wide popularity for years, have shown signs of slipping this season. Grosses of all three major shows are off, with takes running as much as 30% below last year in some situations.

One of the more disturbing aspects of the icers is the reversal of boxoffice trends. In former years, the pattern was to sell out the latter part of the run well ahead of the opening night. The preem and one or two days immediately following had to be gimmicked up by either having some organization sponsor the show or to have the house amply papered so that appearances would be maintained. The first to sell out in advance were the weekends, then the nights close to the end of the run. However, this season, the final nights are not selling out in advance.

The biggest moneymaker in the field this year has been the International edition of "Ice Capades" which has been playing in virgin territory in many instances. But the major reason for its success has been the fact that the bulk of its expenses have already been amortized. The costumes, arrangements, routines and sets had been previously used by the first company of "Ice Capades." Thus the expenses are far lower than would be normal.

The major shows, "Ice Capades," "Ice Follies" and "Holiday on Ice," have been bumping into some strange situations. Towns which had been highly profitable in former years have turned sour. In some of them, the poor gate was not related to local conditions, such as storms, strikes or high unemployment levels. These are the items that are worrying the producers.

The icers are taking comfort in the fact that it may be the entire field of arena shows that are hitting a slump. For example, the Ringling Bros. and Barnum & Bailey Circus has been hitting evil days in some cities. A couple of weeks ago in Philadelphia, the circus threatened to pull out of the city forever unless business perked up.

Some other types of arena shows, such as the rock 'n' rollers, similarly have failed to maintain pace. Even a current hotseller such as Judy Garland didn't make expenses in some situations.

FAMED BUENOS AIRES NITERY TO SHUTTER

Buenos Aires, Dec. 26.

Another Buenos Aires landmark is disappearing, one which is familiar to show biz people around the world the Ta-Ba-Ris' night spot on the Avenida Corrientes, near Esmeralda. Josephine Baker, Maurice Chevalier and Lucienne Boyer are only a few names which have been included in the shows at this spot. For radio or newspaper folks, the Tab was always a refuge where good food could be had at any hour.

Like so many other niteries and eateries in the Buenos Aires of today, the Tab is being pushed out of business by the economics of the "gastronomics" as the waiters' and other eatery unions are called. Andres Trillas, manager and part-owner of the Tab, when announcing the shuttering said that dismissal compensation for the waiting staff would cost him nearly $100,000 but that it is cheaper to shutter than to try and continue operating at a loss.

Cincy's Bev Hills Club Shutters Until March

Cincinnati, Jan. 2.

Beverly Hills, Greater Cincy's top nitery since 1937, shuttered yesterday (Monday) due to "slack season" and reopens in March, according to manager Garson Tucker. He said the spot's new policy is undecided.

The temporary closing came after a New Year's Eve capacity party of 600 as new reform Sheriff George Ratterman, of Campbell County, Ky., took office.

Business has been slow since Oct. 19 when name floorshows gave way to dining and dancing with music by a small combo following state charges of gambling and liquor license violation.

Food, Drink, Fun Taxes Lifted For Japan Tourists

Tokyo, Jan. 2.

Foreign travelers to Japan will enjoy benefits of the government's enlargement of tax exemption treatment for tourists in the new fiscal year which begins in April.

In promoting tourism as an important foreign currency earner, a new measure is being drafted which will exempt tourists from the usual 10% tax on hotel, food, drink and certain amusements spendings.

At present, the ruling is in effect at only 380 of Japan's 40,000 hotels and inns. Expanded ruling would include all hotels and inns as well as restaurants and other tourist facilities. The revised measure is expected to pass the Diet later this month.

The new ruling would settle controversy which threatened to abolish the special tax exemptions for non-resident foreigners. The no-tax treatment is a hangover of measures made during the Occupation for the satisfaction of foreign troops. Socialists opposed continuing such measures, saying it increased the citizens' tax burden. But stronger forces insisted on favoring the promotion of tourism.

Unit Review

Folias de Espana

Washington, Dec. 27.

Ma-de-bor Productions presentation of Enric Madriguera's "Folias de Espana," Spanish song-and-dance revue. Features Nana Lorca, Juan Quintero, Mari Carmen Acevedo, Salvador Castro, Juan Serrano, Ochon, Argentines (5). At Casino Royal, Washington; $1 cover, $4 minimum.

Probably the biggest, fastest and most colorful revue ever staged in D.C. nitery is making its world bow at the Casino Royal.

A hand-picked assemblage of 35 Spanish dancers, guitarists and singers plus an 18-piece orchestra perform an hour-and-50-minute show built upon the compositions of Enric Madriguera, who pioneered the introduction of Latin rhythms to this country in the '30s.

Madriguera, who doubles as a suave m.c. and conductor, has packaged something that requires the dimensions of Radio City Music Hall for full fruition. But even with elbow room at a premium at the Casino Royal (whose owner, Lee Zeiger, accommodated as best he could by enlarging the stage and changing the decor), the revue comes off surprisingly well.

Madriguera's compositions are based on Peninsular folk material but have a strong Broadway musicomedy flavor. Same can be said for the choreography by Jose Toledano and Roberto Carpio as well as the flamboyant costuming by Monic and Cornejo of Madrid.

As originally intended, the "Folias de Espana" was to have a musicomedy thread of a plot. But idea was dropped for the Casino Royal debut because some elaborate backdrops essential to the story line weren't feasible for a nitery setting.

The revue is marked by a whirling pace with many Madriguera

GODFREY'S 1ST VEGAS DATE: THE STARDUST

Arthur Godfrey has been signed for his first Las Vegas cafe date. He's slated for the Stardust Hotel starting Feb. 19. He'll head the interim entertainment between Lido de Paris shows. The current edition folds Feb. 18 and the new frolic gambols in March 5, the day after Godfrey exits. The Buffalo Bills have been booked for the Stardust card with Godfrey and others still to be set.

The Stardust stage requires a flock of alterations to meet the needs of each Lido edition. The first year technicians installed swimming pool and ice skating facilities, another year a huge fire-wall and tanks to take care of a waterfall had to be constructed. Therefore, the hotel has to have a smaller show while the stage is being worked on.

N.Y. Coffee Houses Win Lic. Dept. Jurisdiction

N. Y. Mayor Robert F. Wagner last week signed a bill transferring coffee houses from the jurisdiction of the Police Dept. to the Dept. of Licenses. The new law became effective Jan. 1.

The bill was sponsored by the Coffee Houses Trade Assn., an organization of java-joints in New York's Greenwich Village. Many have been offering entertainment and consequently the Police Dept. sought to list them as cabarets subject to police jurisdiction.

Transfer to the License Dept. will eliminate many of the previous restrictions on the operation of the spots, and will mean that they will not have to take out a cabaret license, but a special permit for coffee houses.

Copacabana, N.Y.

The presence of Sammy Davis Jr. in Jules Podell's nitery at the close of the old year and for the beginning of the new is perhaps the best way to mark the annual event. Davis is one of the finest essences of pure talent and top accomplishment. As ability is one ingredient most appreciated by the public, the boxoffice response should be high throughout the run even during the normally dull post-holiday period.

Davis' act has substance and excitement plus meticulous projection. Each line and movement is rendered with an appreciation of meaning and effect on eye and ear. Nothing is left to chance. Some of his lines have the impact of immediacy and many of his asides, delving into racial and religious areas, are easily accepted by the audience.

The Negro entertainer has peaks in his routines. For example, his closing medley from "Porgy & Bess" and his humorous impressions of the toppers in the singing field are highlights that are hard to equal.

His is a beautifully gaited and skillfully executed turn which, while going over the 60-minute mark, kept auditors enthralled throughout. Davis also shows a knack of making audiences wonder on the contradictions of show biz. He brought in a battery of fiddles that was hardly used. As a matter of fact, the rhythm sections seemed to predominate in all his numbers, which of course, adds to the excitement of the act.

The surrounding turn is by Barbara & Hal Loman, a pair of skilled dancers who work in the modern ballet medium. Their routines are fresh and meaningful. They seem to stay away fom choreographic cliches and weave a story line into their numbers. One sector has a Walter Mittyish theme in which the femme takes on a lot of characterizations, but recedes back to her normal self. Turn constitutes an entertaining bit by a pair of well-coutoured, skilled and highly disciplined dancers.

The Paul Shelley Orch showbacks with its usual competence and the Frank Marti crews provides the Latino motif. Doug Coudy's girls, with vocals by Andy Thomas and Jock Casasus, prance through the proceedings decoratively. Jose.

Statler-Hilton, D.C.

Ravenhaired Eleanor La Forge returns to the Statler-Hilton's posh Embassy Room after a year's absence and stages an uphill 30 minutes of standard supperclub singing against a small but tough, gossippy audience. Those who listen instead of yak enjoy her wholehearted efforts, polished voice and gleaming smile.

Songstress has been a White House performer in past years, with performances before Queen Elizabeth, Nikita Khrushchev, among others. She scores handily here, although Ted de Francis' capable quintet blares over her at times. Talented Danny Ruslander crosshands a pro piano to open the evening.

New Frontier, Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Dec. 22.

"Minsky Follies of 1962," with Irving Benson, Joey Cowan, Jack Mann, Murray Briscoe, Ida Mercier, Pat Amber Halladay, The Eligibles (4), Dick Albershandt, Ingeborg Kjeldsen, Janet Grey, Claire Werner, Alan Conroy, Zero-Zero, Girl Dancers (8), Showgirls (6), Nudes (8), Dick Rice Orch (11); produced by Harold Minsky; choreography, Natalie Komarova and Jeffrey Gyle; sets, Robert Grosh; lighting, Daniel Stradtlander; $4 minimum.

"Minsky's Follies of 1962" is the kind of show with which the Minsky name is associated—it's earthy, bawdy burlesque with many beautiful young girls and a few comics with some beautiful old material. Prudes will find it shocking and the broad minded (pun or otherwise) will find it good nitery fun.

Irving Benson, Joey Cowan, Jack Mann, Murray Briscoe, and Ida Mercier revive the ancient lowe comedy skits, get yocks with their burlesque of burlesque.

The Eligibles, a quartet of vigorous young men whose voices blend ideally, click with "Anything Can Make You Sing" and "Heat Wave."

Stripper Pat Amber Halladay, whose oiled body is her gimmick, is featured. Ingeborg Kjeldsen pleasantly handles the production vocals, and the standout nude (44-25-35) is a Swedish import with the mono-moniker, Veronique. Dick Albershandt gets laughs with his trampoline act; Alan Conroy, Janet Grey, and Claire Werner capably handle the dancing specialties.

A huge shaggy dog named Zero-Zero is one of the cast's laughgetters, and the eight girl dancers, eight nudes, and six showgirls are most decorative. The gorgeous costumes are by Berman; choreography by Natalie Komarova and Jeffrey Gyle. Dick Rice's orch (11) backs the Harold Minsky production, in for an indefinite run. Duke.

Chi Chi, Palm Springs

Eleanor Powell with Four Gentlemen, The Amazing Monahans (4), Clifford Guest, Bill Alexander's Orch (17); $2.50 cover.

For the first time this season Dave Branower booked an act that sold out the Chi Chi Starlite room. Not only that but the capacity draw took place Christmas night. To Eleanor Powell it must have been the best Christmas present since she broke into big time 25 years ago, retired and after 14 years as a housewife, mother and Sunday school teacher returned to her first love-dancing.

It took months of hard work to get the rust out of those beautiful laigs but there are few femme dancers today who come within miles of her skill, variety or staying power. More than $80,000 went into mounting and costuming of this act, and the hazard certainly has paid off.

She appeals primarily to people who remember Ann Pennington, Marilyn Miller, Ruby Keeler, Adele Astaire and possibly Mistinguett, and she confesses freely to being 49, but her vivacity, dexterity and sheer indefatigability have earned standing ovations from dance fans of all ages.

Her act opens here, as elsewhere, with the Four Gentlemen—Roy Fitzell, Tom Allison, Gordon Cornish and Jerry Madison—a singing quartet who can dance a little as well. Their main job, however, is to fill in between Miss Powell's costume changes.

Her first number, a tap to the tune of "Who Can Ask For Anything More?", has her garbed in a white dancing dress with beaded top and high neck in front. Then when the Gentlemen sing that they couldn't dance like Ellie she changes to white tie, top hat, tails and cane and gives more dexterous time steps to "Shine On Harvest Moon" than any moon ever shone on.

Miss Powell then "Blue Danubes" under direction of her own conductor, Richard Priborsky, and goes offstage for another costume change. This time she appears in a toreador's suit of black with white beading and draped by an orange cape of velvet.

As she starts to dance to the "Carmen" music she switches to a smaller cape and finally, in the pantomime of a bullfight and the kill, to a red spangled capelot concealing a dagger. This is her big number but by no means the end.

She leaves for another change and shots in color are projected on the screen. These represent her picture successes from "Born To Dance" through "Broadway Melody" with Fred Astaire. The montage ends with a shot of her dressed in a pink richly-beaded dress and a spotlight pans to her standing below the shot in the same costume. She takes off the skirt and goes into a tour de force of dancing, with her drummer Steve Dweck being outmatched by her taps.

Miss Powell ends, shaking hands with ringsiders along the stage apron, and exits on a warm, gracious and most appealing note.

The Amazing Monahans get a big hand for an opening of acrobats and ventriloquist Cliff Guest wins a lot of laughs out of his dummy who "runs" off stage and refuses to be put back into his suitcase. Scul.

Coincidental or not, Joe E. Lewis and Santa Anita opened same day. All the trackgoers didn't emerge winners, but judging response of the four-fifths turnout at the Grove, they did. Crowd seemed equal parts of show biz and racetrackers and Lewis, as usual, can add scotch and come up with quite a potionable performance.

A bit slow getting out of the gate, Lewis settled into stride down the backstretch (with railbirding hoss trainers Willie Alvarado and Buddy Hirsch tight-ening the girth by passing him drinks from ringside). Like a true cup (sic) horse, Lewis knew it was a route race (65-min. turn) so he conserved energy — and material — till the stretch run. Crossed the wire with plenty in reserve (Seagram's probably) and then basked a bit too long in the winner's circle.

Lewis, per usual, is working sans blinkers and probably no nitery comic lacking his puckish, pixie delivery could get away with such rough handling of political and show biz figures. He intros accompanist Austin Mack with a reference to Sen. Barry Goldwater that startled patrons and applies almost as savage spurs to President Kennedy, Nixon, Sinatra and Bardot.

He managed, too, to weave in five plugs for Slate Bros., a rival nitery. If at times, his humor smacks more of the stable than the clubhouse, they forgave him that, also, and roar approval. The "E" in his name stands for Ever-lovin.'

Preceding, Betty Johnson's 20-minute songalog centers on showtunes. She could concentrate more on slow ballads, obviously her most effective metier off her poignant "Baubles, Bangles." Her phrasing is slick, appearance in silk fuchsia gown fine. The prop poodle is a nice touch.

Flamingo, Las Vegas

Mitzi Gaynor, Les Marthys (2), Don Kirk, Flamingo Orch (17), Flamingoettes (13); presented by Morris Lansburgh; production number choreography by Barry Ashton; musical arrangements, Jerry Fielding; costumes, Bob Carlton; special material, Jay Livingston, Ray Evans, Shirley Henry, Madelyn Martin, and Bob Carroll; $4 minimum.

Mitzi Gaynor's delightful nitery splash, which was a resounding hit here last summer, is brought back intact for the holidays, and will stay for four weeks. Adroitly staged by Robert Sidney, the act showcases Miss Gaynor as a shapely bundle of effervescent talent.

The versatile star sings, dances, and has a pixyish charm warmly welcomed by her audience. Songs include "All I Need," "Time After Time," and a medley from "South Pacific."

Her teammates (Bob Street, Ronnie Dexter, Howard Kreiger, Burnell Dietsch) are handsome, skilled dancers. Musical arrangements are by Jerry Fielding, and the Flamingo orch (17) is conducted for Miss Gaynor by Russell Black.

One of the better balancing acts, Les Marthys (2), are on the bill, and get yocks and gasps with their fast-moving routine.

Barry Ashton's new production number, "No Girl Like A Show Girl," featuring the voice of Don Kirk and the terps of the Flamingoettes (13), is a slick curtain-raiser.

Bobby Darin and Myron Cohen open Jan. 19. Duke.

Harrah's Lake Tahoe

(LOUNGE)

Lake Tahoe, Dec. 30.

In the few years Deedy & Bill have been playing the Reno-Lake Tahoe-Las Vegas spots, they have developed one of the sharpest boy-girl comedy acts in the business—with timing and presentation constantly improving, and always with new and clever material.

For this Tahoe Harrah's playback, the story's the same: a first-rate act all the way, with fast staging, witty lines, smart situation bits, and the inevitable hilarious clowning by the distaffer to Bill's feeder lines.

As the clown, Deedy Peters is a natural. She's a looker but has the talents for the comedic routines, and makes with the facial mobility to fit the moment. As straight man, Bill Greer is highly effective in control of his partner and in setting the pace.

Miss Peters, in their 45-minute turn, is a package of energy and personality with the savvy to capture any audience. Greer proves his value and emoting talents in well-rehearsed routines on a television commercial and other special material, much of it credited to writer Mort Greene.

Two also prove they can play it serious as Miss Peters impresses on vocal solos such as "The Party's Over" and "Island In the Sun," with Greer at the piano. Both also score heavily with impressions of Louis Armstrong, Ethel Merman, Dean Martin, and Lena Horne. Miss Peters' carbon of Miss Horne is uncannily accurate, particularly in the facial mimic.

On the Nevada circiut, Deedy & Bill have been playing the lounges (they compare in many cases with big rooms in other parts of the country), but the duo has the know-how and an act to fill any spot.

hungry i, S.F.

San Francisco, Dec. 28.

Bud Dashiell & the Kinsmen (3), Mark Russell, Maya Angelou, Don Asher Trio; $3 admission.

Enrico Banducci's hungry i, spawning ground for the Kingston Trio, Mort Sahl, the Limeliters and so on, is offering more of the same, and the crowds seem to be buying it.

Bud Dashiell & Kinsmen seem to be Kingstons in levis, except that their patter isn't so sharp and their musicianship is a bit better. Dashiell (formerly of Bud and Travis) is a lean guitar-playing singer whose voice tends to hoarseness, but who plays well and comes equipped with a ready wit.

The two younger members of the Kinsmen are nice-looking, college-type singer-guitarists who must still work on their patter, while the third Kinsman is a wonderful, non-singing Mexican who plays a "Mexican bass"—that is, a guitar about the size of a bullfiddle—on his lap.

In their 45 minutes onstage, this group does nine numbers, mostly of the standard folknik variety — "Shenandoah," "They Called the Wind Maria," "La Bomba," "Johnny, I Hardly Knew Ya," etc. Their sound, when they're all banging their instruments at once, is dandy, and the three singers' voices blend quite well.

All are clean-cut and all undoubtedly appeal to the college and post-grad crowd which frequents the i. Their efforts at breezy chatter, between songs, seem rather forced at times, however, and they can afford to cut out a few plugs for their Warner Bros. album without losing the point.

Mark Russell is a bright, young pianist-comic who looks and sounds like across between Bob Newhart and Tom Lehrer. He has lost of stage poise, a fine sense of timing and, probably most important of all, keeps tossing lines at his audience swiftly, so that if one joke bombs he's ready with two more.

On the whole, his 40-minute act is quite funny, especially when he goes into set pieces a la Newhart (one is a remarkably funny satire of Negro comics in which Russell looks at everything from the viewpoint of the American Indian). Less amusing are many of his topical gags. Occasionally, he'll turn to his piano and, standing up, whack out a familiar tune to which he's set satirical lyrics—quite funny, too. Crowd thinks he's terrific, and he gets a big hand.

Maya Angelou, a onetime habitue of Frisco's Purple Onion, has returned with a satchel full of numbers new for her, and in her 22 minutes unloads a swingin' "Yes, I Know," a marvelous "Troubled in Mind," a Nigerian folksong, "Driver Man" from Max Roach's and Oscar Brown, Jr.'s "Freedom Now Suite" and a fine "Feelin' Good."

She has a superb, wide-ranging voice and evidently has learned to use it to maximum effect—very jazzy. Miss Angelou, who used to perform without shoes, wears 'em now. Pianist Don Asher, bassist Carlos Duran and guitarist Eddie Duran back her nicely.

Roosevelt Grill, N. Y.

Guy Lombardo and his Royal Canadians are back at the Hotel Roosevelt Grill, and all is well. In fact, the ropes are up and seem destined to be for weeks to come. Lombardo is in for a minimum of 10 weeks, according to John G. Horsman, general manager of the hotel. It is the 31st annual engagement for the maestro in this eastside room. It's estimated that he has played the Roosevelt more than 5,000 nights, which obviously is a marathon record for a band in any hotel room.

Just why his popularity continues is obvious as soon as Lombardo steps on the podium and swings into "Autumn Leaves." Most of the Grill's patrons like to dance, and the floor is of such size that it makes for easy terping. And with Lombardo playing, the beat is certainly easy to follow.

Lombardo's crew differs little from his last stand here with exception of the outfit being a little larger. He also has added some new talent which is easily discernible. He has two trombones, two trumpets, four sax, bass horn, twin piano players, traps, French horn and percussionist.

This time around, Lombardo has a trio consisting of Cliff Grass, Ken Gardener and Bill Flanagan. Gardener does most of the solo ballading, but Flanagan runs him a close second with vocals. Flanagan also plays the Claviette, a novel instrument.

Fred Kreitzer and Buddy Brennan are the pianists who operate the twin pianos, especially effective with "Tammy." Gardener's vocalizing of the novel, typically Lombardo tune, "Bonaparte's Retreat," was one of his better efforts.

"Climb Every Mountain" is a high spot both from the band standpoint and the vocalizing. "True Love" brings on the singing group while "Up Lazy River" finds the euphonium substituted for the French horn for an excellent payoff. Band also uses a new recording, "Bright Lights of Brussels," for top returns. "Stardust," "Goodbye to Rome" and a medley of "Make Believe," "Time on Hands" and "Who" are other standout numbers.

Lombardo is broadcasting a half hour nightly over CBS, and is due for a full hour on CBS-TV on New Year's Eve.

The Al Conte Trio, originally introed to the Roosevelt Grill a number of years ago by Lombardo, again is spelling the band for patron dancing. Conte, pianist-leader, goes in more for the Latin tunes or novelty numbers. The outfit is equally adept at either. Wear.

Sahara, Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Dec. 22.

Donald O'Connor, Sidney Miller, Joanie Sommers, Louis Da Pron, Moro-Landis Dancers (18), Louis Basil Orch (15); produced by Stan Irwin; choreography, George Moro; stage direction, Sy Lein; $4 minimum.

Donald O'Connor, always a strong fave here, brings in what is probably his best song & dance session to date, getting fine assistance from sidekick Sidney Miller and songstress Joanie Sommers.

Highlight of the bash is the "Songwriters" skit, with new and very funny material by Miller and Sid Kuller, which is aided by improbable, hilarious props as the team does a burlesque on celeb impreshes. O'Connor's songs include "Make Someone Happy" and "Me and My Shadow," with talented terper Louis Da Pron joining in on the latter. The star shows his topdrawer hoofing ability in the finale.

Miss Sommers, a beautiful young chirp, is highly effective in her debut here, and is a sure bet to rise to headline status. She sings such numbers as "Baby, Don't You Go Away Mad," "Looking At You," "You Love Me," and churns her turn with a charging arrangement of "Blues In The Night."

A colorful, imaginative salute to Hollywood, concocted by George Moro and spotlighting curvy Kathy Boling and the 18 "Most American Girls In The World" initials the Stan Irwin production, backed by the Louis Basil orch (15), which is here until Feb. 6 when Connie Francis returns. Duke.

Fairmont, San Francisco

San Francisco, Dec. 29.

Tony Bennett; the Blue Notes (4), Ernie Heckscher Orch (9); $3-$3.50 cover.

Tony Bennett, smiling and outwardly easy-going, packs a load of entertainment into his act, and earns the wholehearted cheers of a big crowd for his work.

In his 51 minutes onstage, Bennett sings 22 songs—possibly a new course record—and sings nearly all of them well. This is noteworthy, because the numbers range from a boisterous Dixieland arrangement of "Chicago" to a soul-searing version of Kurt Weill's and Maxwell Anderson's "Lost in the Stars." Indeed, these two songs are back-to-back, and the fact that Bennett can do them both—and do them effectively—is an indication of his versatility.

Since Bennett last appeared at the Fairmont, he seems to have honed some of the rough edges from his act and, at the same time, acquired a better singing voice—or perhaps he's learned to use his voice better, to pace himself and not to push so hard. At any rate, he's mellower, less frenetic, but charming as ever. In fact, his patter between songs is neater and more amusing than it was several years ago.

For this show his excellent conductor-pianist, Ralph Sharon, dug up a lovely, decades-old Frisco ballad, "I Left My Heart in San Francisco," which Bennett socks across with telling effect—it could be a record hit in Frisco, at least. Drummer Billy Exiner and Ernie Heckscher's orch give fine support, as does a Frisco vocal group, the Blue Notes.

Eddys.' K.C.

Kansas City, Dec. 30.

The Headliners (4), The Continentals (4); $1.50-$2 cover.

Ann Edwards is billed as heading The Headliners, but it is pretty much a family group which has been playing lounges on the Coast and Nevada spots. The date here is its first at Eddys', and it is drawing acceptable biz in the face of miserable winter weather. This show went at a special $3.50 cover, with favors, for the New Year's Eve celebration Saturday (30).

The group varies its 55 minutes with a heavy emphasis on jazz, some novelties entered to change the pace and even an odd bit of comedy here and there. Important to the company is Miss Edwards on the piano and accordion, and her brother, Jimmy Nuzzo, outstanding reed man. Mitch Edwards on drums and Paul Fontes on electric guitar round out the group.

They are especially effective as Nuzzo leads on tenor sax on "Harlem Nocturne" and "Honky Tonk," and again as he later shifts to the clarinet for "St. Louis Blues." Miss Edwards has a fine inning with jazz piano versions of "Warsaw Concerto" and "Malaguena." There are some parodies with rather risque vocals by the gal, a country tune by Fontes and a ribbing of radio commercials by all for added comedy. They are best at the straight musical work, but handle the comedy ably enough for variety. Quin.

Mister Kelly's, Chi

Irwin Corey, Rosette Shaw, John Frigo Trio; $2.50 cover.

Irwin Corey's devoted Chi following has been building for the 16 years he has been playing clubs in this city, and, as topliner for Mister Kelly's holiday show, he is back with more of the surefire sight gags and mangled dialectics that have made him a fave on the local nitery circuit.

In Corey's case familiarity breeds yocks, and just the explosive utterance of one of his pontifical phrases—". . . however!" or ". . . furthermore!"—broke up the pre-conditioned first night auditors.

The comic's regular 10-minute opening panto is in the great clown tradition as his mobile face segues from anticipation to delight, consternation, sadness, horror and silent convulsions of laughter. His tanglefooted excursions into erudition never quite reach their conclusion before he is off on another ill-fated tangent. Only change in Corey's act is a new cutaway coat, which he maintains he is renting out to moths in the daytime.

Showopener Rosette Shaw is a mite of a girl with a sharp ability to set a mood in song. Interesting offbeat numbers in her songalog include "Across Tomorrow Mountain" and "Tea For Two" sung in French.

She stamps her own personal dramatic flair on a soft, bluesy rendition of "Am I Blue," a poignant version of "I Love You, Porgy," and "Face The Music."

John Frigo's house trio backs Miss Shaw stylishly and keeps the customers cheerful between shows.

Corey and Miss Shaw are in for three weeks. Mor.

Saddle & Sirloin, Tucson

Tucson, Dec. 27.

The Novelites (3); no cover, $2 minimum Sat.

Boniface Jim Sfarnas has booked into his Saddle & Sirloin his most expensive and zaniest act yet, The Novelites, and reaped a bonanza in laughs. With the fastest paced show yet seen in these parts, the yocks come at a lightning clip at the drop of one of the many hats the threesome centers the act around.

The trio, with accompaniment of piano and drums, are rubberfaced Frankie Carr, the chief comic; straightman Joe Mayer, and Chuck Leonard, who does most of the solo singing.

The show is so evenly put together, it's difficult to single out a particular routine. But biggest applause-getters are the "Tribute to Burlesque" bit and the "Nobody's Sweetheart Now" routine.

Begoff comes after the latter, followed by an "Alabama Jubilee" topper. The Novelites close Jan. 3, to be followed the next night by Tucsonan, Eddie Peabody, the "banjo king." Alex.

The Losers, L.A.

Los Angeles, Dec. 28.

Any itinerant nitery act, to realize its fullest potential, must make a complete adjustment to the pecularities and characteristics of the locale in which it appears. There is a subtle, but absolutely essential, difference in the collective tastes and entertainment desires of the citizens of any city or community.

A perfect example of the necessity for such geographical sensitivity lies in the act of Edi Domingo & Renee Renor, who arrived at this La Cienega spot for a four-week stand after several months of exposure in Vegas and Reno. This is an exciting act endowed with striking and compatible talent and rich promise. Yet just how great an impact it will have here and the exact scope of its future hinges on the ability of this handsome couple to sense the prevailing climate of reception that exists in the L.A. nitery circuits.

Los Angeles, as Domingo and Miss Renor will quickly discover, is quite a different proposition than the Nevada gambling capitals to which they are accustomed. In L.A. there is a vital need for intimacy in an act, unlike the mood of Nevada, where the lounge performer, more often than not, must compete with roulette, crap and 21 for the customer's rather casual, objective, impersonal attention. If Domingo and Miss Renor effect the transition, they could be a huge success. They've got what it takes.

Domingo is an engaging, romantic Latin with a mellow voice, an obvious sense of vocal artistry, and a deep-rooted appreciation of lyric meaning. Senorita Renor, on the other hand, stresses flash, sex animal chemistry and an I-don't-care approach to her material. Yet together they are a most co-existent duo, physically and harmonically complementing the other.

Domingo's expressive, heartfelt solo of "Yellow Bird" brings a new dimension to this ditty. It's the high spot of the turn. Miss Renor, whose voice is a cross between Teresa Brewer and Kay Starr, with a twist of Eartha Kitt, and whose physique needs no comparison, would enhance her natural appeal simply by concentrating on the tunes and the audience and toning down the sultry, suggestive asides.

Trombonist Frank Rosolino, one of the foremost Coast exponents of cool jazz and a refreshingly funny and irreverent musician, holds over with quartet (drummer Bill Goodwin, painist Victor Feldman, bassist Albert Stinson) to Jan. 7. Tube.

Tropicana, Las Vegas

Las Vegas, Dec. 27.

"Folies Bergere of 1962," with Harry Mimmo, Andre Tahon, Jenny Astruc, Colette Bousquet, Lee Sharon, Linda Lombard, Dior Dancers (4), Los Chavales de Espana, Tommy Mara, Felicia Atkins, Showgirls and Dancers (65), Ray Sinatra Orch (14); produced by Lou Walters, by arrangement with Paul Derval; scenery, costumes and artistic direction by Michel Gyarmathy; choreography, Billy Petch; $4 minimum.

The 1962 edition of the "Folies Bergere" is a spectacular colorful bash with beautiful girls, gorgeous costumes and a well-balanced lineup of specialty acts. Outside of Vegas it would be a blockbuster, but here it will be compared to previous "Folies" editions and will fall short of those topdrawer presentations.

Nitery patrons looking for a predominantly French revue will be disappointed, perhaps, because the outstanding acts — Harry Mimmo and Los Chaveles de Espana—are Italian and Spanish, respectively, and the music features Ravel, Gershwin, Chopin, and Wagner, capped by a Stars and Stripes finale.

On the plus—and French—side are singer-comedienne Jenny Astruc, who is a good bet for American films; Colette Bousquet, an exciting dancer; and the delightful puppetry of Andre Tahon, whose "Caterpillar and Snail" act has long been a fave in Vegas.

The Florence and Frederic Dancers do fast, familiar routines; exotic terp Lee Sharon, the spine-chilling Dior Dancers, chirp Linda Lombard, dancer Ugo Pellicia, singer Tommy Mara and showgirl Felicia Atkins are spotlighted with finesse in the best tradition of showman Lou Walters, who coordinated the affair.

The satirical dancing and pantomime of returnee Harry Mimmo, plus the repeat click of another Vegas fave musical group, Los Chavales de Espana, doubtless will cause this "Folies" to have a long and profitable run.

Ray Sinatra conducts the orch (14), Billy Petch is choreographer and Michel Gyarmathy is artistic director. The revue, in for an indefinite run, is presented by Walters by arrangement with Paul Derval. Duke.

Unit Review

numbers having a climactic oomph worthy of a grand finale. A youthful, handsome selection of native talent puts on a flashy exhibition of hyperkinetics, applying a primitive gusto even to the more sophisticated bits.

Hit of the show is a flamenco tableau during which the dancers are given free rein to improvise. Result is a slow building to a dancing frenzy, which has the more uninhibited outfronters on their feet shouting.

Standout among the performers are Juan Serrano, who plays the flamenco guitar with classical style, and femme dancers Nana Lorca and Mari Carmén Acevedo. Latter particularly score with their stomping, twirling and grimacing. Male dancers Juan Quintero and Salvador Castro are less lusty, but slick hoofers.

Ochoa is a hefty, virile type with a big baritone used for romantic ballads. The Five Argentines, a male quintet from that country, could use a bit more polish in their pop vocalizing.

The troupe has a flexible three to six-week stand at the Casino Royale before embarking on a tour still to be firmed up. Jay.

SOVIET FESTIVAL ON DESPITE RESISTANCE

Bombay, Dec. 26.

A 15-day festival of Soviet Union films to be conducted at Bombay's Excelsior Theatre through Jan. 11, 1962, is actively assisted by Bombay Production unit, Filmalaya. Releases to be unreeled during period include "First Flight O'Stars," "Leila Medjnum," "The Letter That Was Not Sent," "Ballad of a Soldier," "The Mameluke," and "Maiden Spring," all dubbed in English.

Red efforts to popularize Soviet films in India, are, however, meeting with acute resistance, despite very big assist from local industryites and Commies. Red China is a thorn in India's flesh at present.

New Acts

DON RICE
Comedy
25 Mins.
Playboy Club, Chicago

The Playboy Club has been proving a boon to seasoned club date acts in providing many of them with their first location jobs, although they may have been working the banquet, convention and lodge meeting circuit for years. Don Rice, a low-key monologist, currently in the Playroom of the club, is a case in point.

Rice has a deceptively easy and offhand approach as he unreels his gagalog of keen one-liners and ingratiating anecdotes. The Playboy Club would not ordinarily be an ideal setting for a low-pressure comic, but Rice had control of auditer attention all the way. His material is wideranging, covering politics, air travel, family situations and saloon society, but always with a goodnatured tolerance for human weakness and foibles.

He consistently pulled good yocks, as for instance with his local-reference gags: "Chicago is the only city where you can get a haircut at 3 a.m.—in an alley." Or: "My father was a tailgunner on a beer truck in Prohibition." He also works over teevee: "For fast, fast, fast relief—turn off your set." Or, of the space program: "They ought to name the next series of missiles Social Security—you can't fire 'em and you can't get 'em to work."

Rice's astute wit and well-filled gag bag is adult, but never blue, and he shapes as a sharp contender as a supporting act in the prime rooms or as topliner in the second-rank clubs. Mor.

LAURA BETTI
Songs
120 Mins.
Theatre Athenee, Paris

Laura Betti is an Italian singer definitely in the offbeat category. She seems to be a reflection of "La Dolce Vita" aspects of modern day Rome, and, in fact, played a small part in one of the orgy scenes in that picture. So with a sweet voice she essays songs that mainly purvey perverted innocence, macabre humor, and sudden shafts of religious outlook.

She has long blonde hair, a ripe chassis, and an interesting face. She wears a smart suit for the first part and black tights and a hip-length sweater for the second. Eschewing a mike, she just about projects in this medium-sized house. Accompanied by a piano, she has some plus production aspects and lighting.

But Miss Betti appears more slated for specialized boites than for theatrical exposure. Songs have been penned her by some of the top Italian writers like Alberto Moravia, Pier Paolo Pasolini, Fabio Mauri and others. Music is simple and the words and interpretation are the thing. She speaks as well as sings many of the special songs.

Miss Betti displays a spunk that is the mainstay in putting over this fairly eerie look at bored high life, twisted youth, and dark anarchic humor. She definitely mirrors something eating at society which makes her a most specialized item but one that could be used if properly placed and handled. She did her stint in excellent French with the songs expertly adopted by Jean Rougeul. She also speaks and sings in good English and is planning to give her rep stateside.

She appears in for a limited run here and would call for savvy placement in U.S. spots. She is difficult but a possibility for specialized playoff in New York with the right slotting. Her thespic underlining and stance is good. Filippo Crivelli staged this song stint with good piano accompaniment by Toni Lenzi. Mosk.

CAROLYN HESTER
Songs
34 Mins.
Le Hibou, Ottawa

Carolyn Hester has a pleasant, versatile set of pipes which she knows how to use to solid advantage in her stint of folk chirps. She has had some voice training and it shows in songs that climb to the higher notes. But Miss Hester, short looker with long hair, lacks a routine which will confine her abilities to coffee-and-folk-rooms like Le Hibou. She sings songs she likes when she feels like singing them, but makes no attempt to string them together with gab or continuity.

She already has had some experience in niteries (Showboat, Gate of Horn, others) and has a second LP coming out early in 1962 on Columbia. But she would be wise to restrict in-person work to intimate rooms that demand a minimum of showmanship and maximum of clicko sound. Gorm.

Las Vegas Lounges

salaries for stars, show girls, dancers, musicians, stage hands, electricians, etc.

"Such powerhouse attractions as Frank Sinatra, Dean Martin, and Sammy Davis Jr., who pack the Sands show rooms and make the casino bosses happy would be even more valuable in a lounge," Victorson declares.

"Maybe they would do three shows instead of two in the lounge—shorter shows, of course—and the turnover would be that much more."

Aside from the fact that money would be saved by the hotel by eliminating costly production numbers, the lounge policy has further economic advantages.

Dim View

Casino execs take a dim view of having about 600 people as a captive audience in a show room for 90 minutes, because there is little chance that the gambling men might leave their ladies and come out for a session of gaming. However, in a lounge, the situation is more flexible. The informality of a lounge makes it comparatively easy for the gamblers to leave their tables and return at any time.

The hotels usually lose money, or at best break even on the food served in a show room, but there's a tremendous markup on liquor—and in the lounges, only liquor is sold.

The turnover in a lounge keeps the bartenders and the casino dealers busy, because there is action from approximately 6 p.m. until 6 a.m. Another advantage of lounge entertainment is that the patrons do not have to worry about being there at a certain time for the show—they know the acts run continuously, and they can be reasonably sure of catching a certain act if it will be on three or four times a night.

The Flamingo is one of the Strip hotels which is giving equal attention to its lounge and showroom. In fact, the Flamingo lounge name has been changed to "Flamingo Driftwood Room" to please those acts who do not like the name "lounge" and consider it second rate. The Sahara long ago changed the name of its lounge to "Sahara Casbar Theatre," at the request of Louis Prima & Keely Smith, who were headlining there at that time.

The Flamingo, with such stars as Harry James, Sarah Vaughan, Della Reese, Lionel Hampton, Don Cornell, Norman Brooks, and newly signed Billy Eckstine, gets SRO action nearly every night.

The Sands, which has headlined Ella Fitzgerald in its lounge and more recently, Jerry Vale, is another strong lure for loungers.

The Riviera, Sahara, and Dunes have recently remodeled their lounges, making them larger to cope with the new trend. The Riviera has such attractions as Buddy Greco, Billy Williams, Kay Stevens, and Sammy Kaye in the lounge; the Mary Kaye Trio, Don Rickles, Ray Anthony, Arthur Ellen, Freddie Bell, and Deedy & Bill are Sahara regulars (although the Mary Kaye Trio recently defected to the Tropicana); and the Dunes has such as Al Hirt, Roberta Sherwood, Billy Eckstine, and the Novelites.

The Desert Inn, up until recently a spot which soft-pedaled big time lounge acts, now has Frankie Carle on its roster. Across the Strip from the DI, those durable Ink Spots have had a long run in the New Frontier lounge.

The Stardust has such solid regulars as Roberta Linn, the DeCastro Sisters, the Four Aces, and the Happy Jesters in the lounge.

The Silver Slipper, which has as its main show attraction the Hank Henry burlesque bash, has Charlie Teagarden in the lounge to hold on to the departing patrons.

House Review

ABC, Paris

Paris, Dec. 18.

Jean-Claude Pascal, Machucambos (3), Talo Boys (5), Vic Perry, Pierre Etex, Josy Andrieu, Gil Dova, Salici Puppets (2); $2.50 top.

Jean-Claude Pascal is a personable, good looking film star who insists on singing too. He has a way of putting over his assorted numbers in a clever manner with a pleasing voice. But his style lacks an individual quality, and he is mainly a pull on his film name.

Knowing he sounds like many singers, Pascal also imitates them. His is a disarming stint and one that gets by on sheer voice, projection and workmanship.

Machucambos are a pro and polished Latino trio with expert, catchy and colorful renditions of jumpy and sad songs.

Talo Boys spoof turn-of-the-century acrobatics and have enough knowhow to make this both a good filler on its movement and yocks on its comedics. Vic Perry goes into the audience for pickpocket tactics for an acceptable vaude turn.

Pierre Etex is a witty comic with breakaway props and timing while Gil Dova has a smart and dextrous juggling bit.

Josy Andrieu gives out three folk songs in a subdued manner which marks her as needing more work. She's more suited for boites at this point than vaude houses. Salici Puppets are expertly handled by a man and woman for the usual appeal of these stringed marionettes.

Show is only fair and in for only a fair three weeks of biz.

Maitre D'oubles

Colling. Not wishing to place too heavy a burden on Streitman, he relieved the maitre d' of the floorshow assignment.

A last-minute development also resulted in Karalis locating comedian Lenny Bruce in New York and brought him in to open Friday night for a brief return engagement, appearing with Miss Collins; Bruce scored at Freddie's two years ago.

In a telegram to Karalis, not received until a few hours before he had been heavily advertised in the newspapers to open, drummer Rich stated that his combo's vibraphonist had been taken suddenly ill in New York and he would have to cancel out.

Before coming here to become maitre d' at the Hotel Radisson Flame Room, then the Twin Cities' leading supper club, Streitman had been headwaiter at the Diplomat nitery in Hollywood, Fla. But prior to that and other headwaiter and maitre d' jobs in tony supper clubs, he was a singing waiter in New York's Greenwich Village niteries.

Toots Shor's Mob Scene

and word-of-publicity, the traffic became terrific.

The common cliche expressed—"well, we're home!"—perhaps best applies to the boniface. Shor, since selling out his 51 West 51 St. site to complete the parcel that was to have been the first Rockefeller Center site of a skyscraper hotel and now the Sperry Gyroscope Bldg., has been out of action for almost three years until snagging the present West 52d St. location. The Teamsters Union's pension fund also helped underwrite the Myers Bros. garage.

New Restaurant Row

Incidentally, there will be the new N.Y. Hilton Hotel in Rockefeller Center, but at an across-6th Ave. location and a block further north, at 53d St., all of which evolves into still further business potentials for any and all restaurants on West 52d St. It is now one of the several new Manhattan "restaurant rows" that have sprung up.

From Schrafft's to Shor's is but one evolution, with "21," of course, the kingpin class eatery on the block. In this connection, there is bonhommie between the Kriendler-Berns clan, of the posh "21," and Toots Shor who, while he was footloose, played the saloon circuits all over Manhattan with the exception of the Stork Club, since his differences with Sherman Billingsley, and vice versa, had reached a legalistic stage. Next-door to Shor's is the homeoffice building of "21" Brands Inc., the wine and liquor offshoot of the restaurant, and if for no other reason than that Shor's will be a very fluid dispensary of "21" Brands (and other wholesalers' commodities) there was a "Welcome, Toots Shor" wreath in the window.

However, neither maison-de-booze & food need be too concerned about economic inroads. Both point to the groundswell of new building in the immediate periphery, from the Sperry Bldg. to the N.Y. Hilton; from the new airconditioned apartment houses shooting up on 6th Ave. in the 50s to the additional office buildings; from the CBS Bldg. on the 52d St. & 6th Ave. corner to the equally posh Loew-Tisch Americana Hotel on 7th Ave. and 53d St. "So there will be plenty of business for all of us," as Shor and the Kriendlers have previously expressed themselves. In fact a new P. J. Moriarity's and Mike Minucci's is due on the same block.

This, too, for the record, is still another evolution of the recent dramatic shifts in the general facade of Manhattan which, in the past decade, transformed Park Ave., from the 40s and 50s, into showcase office buildings for big business, and more recently has resulted in a marked rehabilitation of 6th Ave., long after Rockefeller Center paved the way.

So, too, West 52d St. of the 1920s and 1930s, alternately known as "Swing Street" and "the Montmartre of America" has evolved from a nitery row into restaurant row. The Montmartre billing was hung on the street by a VARIETY man who did a feature story on the 34 assorted bistros, niteries, jazzrooms, resturants, pubs, club and taverns that crowded West 52d St. from 5th to 6th Ave. at one time, in even closer density than the environs of Place Blanche, rue Pigalle and Place Pigalle in Paris' Montmartre sector.

Incidentally, still another restarant row has been quietly evolving in the same sector, on West 56th St., also between 5th and 6th Ave. (no native calls it Avenue of the Americas, as former Mayor LaGuardia once decreed). Starting with espresso joints and kindred coffeehouses, West 56th now is dotted with Italian, French and American eateries and niteries. In somewhat lesser degree that has become true also of West 55th St., between the same avenue.

Shor's preem brings this into 1962 focus.

Pour les Sports

A sports addict of almost rabid proportions, Shor feels that sports' personalities are even more glamorous than the show biz names that punctuate the posh filling stations. "That's why, whenever people go out, and you know people come to see other people when they step out," philosophizes Shor, "they'll see more celebrities here than any other saloon!" (Shor takes perculiar pride in calling himself "saloonkeeper"—he sneers at any other fancy nomenclature).

When "Baby" (Mrs.) Shor and her family Cadillaced to the informal preem of the new saloon she stopped at the door and, also, threw 80c out in direction of Rockefeller Center. This was the gesture Shor made when his old 51st St. joint debuted—he threw his last 80c onto the gutter and "started clean" until selling out for $1,500,000 to the Webb & Knapp (Zeckendorf) realty people who put that Sperry Bldg. plot together.

The new Shor's approximates the former restaurant in motif and decor excepting that the main overflow room is downstairs, not on the second floor. The second floor has still a third restaurant, which can be controlled for private parties. Next to it is his executive office, deliberately not too pretentious. He apologizes for the private lavatory. He also apologizes for the closed-circuit hookup which enables him to see the entire operation.

"This is only because," he explains, "when the Sam (Klein) or Jack (Barry)—his major domos—phone up that so-and-so is here I can see 'em. If they're talking business or romancing, the heck with 'em; if some buddy, however, is alone I gotta come down and sit with them. That's a saloonkeeper's obligation," he continued matter-of-factly. "Oh yes, the unions don't squawk about this closed-tv; the waiters know I'm no stoolpigeon!"

Circus Review

Cirque Medrano, Paris

Paris, Dec. 16.

Achille Zavatta & Co. (6), Benneweis Tigers, Miss Dash Chimpanzees, Eliane Knie Birds, Lothar, Schickler Sisters (2), Bassis (2), Jacky Lupescu, Maika & Peter, Tosca De Lac, Marrakech Troupe (8); $3.50 top.

Violette Medrano has wisely returned to a circus program after various attempts to use vaudeville, tv stars and revue aspects to perk lagging attendance. This all-sawdust show, with clowns, trapeze acts and animals featured, should have good moppet biz for the holidays and entice those who still want straight circus.

Achille Zavatta is a gifted clown who creates a vulnerable buttinski character that leads to yocks in a takeoff on filmmaking and the winning of a lottery ducat. He also shows a feeling for mime and pathos in a bit about a lonely tramp on Christmas Eve. Zavatta gives the show its center and force.

Benneweis Tigers, comprising six snarling beasts, jump through hoops and roll about. They're cajoled by Benneweis who keeps clear of attempted cuffs. It is a fairly disturbing entry, but he deserve a plus for his derring-do. Miss Dash Chimps are a canny wistful lot who get their laughs by aping people. Eliane Knie Birds are parrots that shoot guns, do acrobatics, etc. for an okay entry.

Maika & Peter put two bears on bikes and motorcycles for a nice number while Schickler Sisters (2) essay a fine equestrienne turn on two prancing, dancing horses. Jacky Lupescu mounts a slack wire to juggle and execute some hard turns somewhat flattened by a too obvious intensity. A greater ease would make this a smarter act.

Lothar does headstands and handstands on a swinging trapeze with ease for mitts while Tosca De Lac cavorts atop a rope swung from below by a partner for eye-catching movements, arm swings and grace. Bassis (2) add a neat risley bit and Marrakech Troupe (8) some bounding, pleasant acrobatics.

Add to this some good house clowns and extras to make up an okay show. But it needs some more outstanding acts to really put the production into the good old circus tradition. However, the entry is a wise return to circus ways and it appears there's a place here for a real one-ring permanent circus.

How to Succeed by Really Trying: Get B'way Name, Then Go Off-B'way

By JESSE GROSS

The off-Broadway-to-Broadway springboard is working in reverse these days. There have been name performers in off-Broadway shows in recent seasons, but now there's a rash of established Main Stem producers, writers and directors on the basement-and-belfry scene.

"Madame Aphrodite," which preemed last Thursday (29) at the Orpheum Theatre, N.Y., has book and lyrics by Tad Mosel and music by Jerry Herman. Mosel was represented on Broadway last season as author of the Pulitzer Prize-winner, "All the Way Home," which he adapted from James Agee's "A Death in the Family." Herman is currently represented on the Main as composer-lyricist of the click "Milk and Honey."

Two vet Broadway producers, Cheryl Crawford and Kermit Bloomgarden, are also currently involved with off-Broadway vehicles. Miss Crawford is producer of "Brecht on Brecht," which begins a limited engagement tonight (Wed.) at the Theatre de Lys. Bloomgarden is partnered with Harry Joe Brown Jr. in the production of Errol John's "Moon on a Rainbow Shawl," opening next Monday night (8) at the East Eleventh Street Theatre, N.Y. Main Stem stager George Roy Hill is directing "Shawl."

The Brecht offering, which was presented several weeks ago at the de Lys as part of the ANTA matinee series at the theatre, contains scenes from plays by Brecht, in addition to poems, songs, sayings and the relating of events by and about Brecht. The material has been selected and arranged by playwright George Tabori, who collaborated with the late author-director on the play, "Life of Galileo."

The cast for the de Lys presentation, impressive for an off-Broadway production, includes Dane Clark, Anne Jackson, Lotte Lenya, Viveca Lindfors (Mrs. Tabori), George Voskovec and Michel Wager. Also involved in the Broadway movement is the "Second City" company, which reopened in a Greenwich Village cabaret theatre following its recent Main Stem fold.

Aim 'Fortuna' as Opener Of Diversified Program For Off-B'way Maidman

"Fortuna," the premiere of which was postponed from Dec. 20 to tonight (Wed.), at the Maidman Theatre, N.Y., is planned as the gateway entry in a program of diversified offerings at the 199-seater. The musical, an adaptation of a drama by Edouardo De Filippo and Armando Curcio with book and lyrics by Arnold Weinstein and music by Francis Thorne, is being produced by Burritt Productions, which has leased the Maidman for one year.

John Wulp, a playwright-director-designer, is president of firm. Other members are lawyer-producer Sam Cohn, Weinstein and Thorne. It's the intention of the corporation to make the Maidman a "Writer's Theatre" by offering a repertory policy, in addition to presenting impromptu revues, reading of new scripts by the New Dramatists Committee and a children's theatre.

Weinstein's avant garde comedy, "Red Eye of Love," which Cohn and Wulp produced off-Broadway earlier this season, is to be revived for a repertory run with "Fortuna." Ben Bagley, who has produced revues off-Broadway, is to stage a series of Monday night sketch-and-song entries at the Maidman, the first of which will be called "The Big Broadcast of 1962."

Besides his off-Broadway activities, Weinstein is the recipient of a Ford Foundation grant to collaborate with composer Ned Rorem on an opera version of "Mamba's Daughters," which has been commissioned for production next season by the N. Y. City Opera. Weinstein also collaborated with composer Laurence Rosenthal on "The Party," a musical on the production agenda of Cheryl Crawford.

Ready to Start Work On Mills as Culture Spot

Renaissance House, Inc., which announced in 1960 plans for taking over the Mills Hotel in Greenwich Village, N.Y., for conversion from a flophouse to a cultural center and artists' residence, acquired the lease on the property last month.

Reconstruction of the hotel at a cost in excess of $1,250,000 is scheduled to begin shortly. It's expected the new building, which will have 304 rooms for more than 600 residents, two off-Broadway theatres, workshop, studio and auditorium space, dining and other facilities, will be completed by next fall.

Equity and AGVA Tussle on 'City' Will Go to 4A's

The move of the "Second City" company to an off-Broadway cabaret theatre following its recent Broadway fold has precipitated a jurisdictional dispute between Actors Equity and the American Guild of Variety Artists. The revue, which was recently under the jurisdiction of Equity at the Royale Theatre, N.Y., for 11 weeks, is now operating under an AGVA contract at a Greenwich Village spot, tagged Second City at Square East.

Both Equity and AGVA have jurisdiction over cabaret-theatre offerings, depending on the format used. AGVA however, has been pushing for complete jurisdiction over all such cabaret presentations. A second company of "Second City" has been under Equity jurisdiction in its original Chicago berth since the original troupe moved to Broadway.

Under Equity's jurisdiction, the Second City venture would have to get special dispensation for its move to Greenwich Village, since Equity has a ruling which requires a waiting period of six months before a production that has closed on Broadway may be done off-Broadway in the same season.

Equity intends bringing the controversy before the Assn. of Actors & Artists of American, the parent body of the theatrical performing unions.

Manning in Residence For Boston Univ. Stint

Boston, Jan. 3.

Actor-director Jack Manning, director of the Helen Hayes Equity Group in New York, will stage "Twelfth Night" for presentation Feb. 22-24 by the Boston Univ. Theatre as its third production of the season.

He will be in residence at the college for four weeks to teach, lecture and direct the play.

Definitely True

David Merrick, continuing his feud with N.Y. Times drama critic Howard Taubman, sent the reviewer a telegram last Thursday (28) commenting on his pan that morning of "Subways Are for Sleeping," which the producer had unveiled the previous night at the St. James Theatre, N.Y. The wire read:

"At last you were definite. I congratulate you."

NBC May Retain Hudson Theatre For Color Tele

The deal for the sale of the Hudson Theatre, N. Y., to garage operator Samuel Lehrer has apparently fallen through. However, it's understood that NBC, which returned the house to legit in 1960, now intends putting it back into operation as a television studio because of an anticipated increase in New York television production.

NBC presumably feels it can use the 1,065-seater, since it's giving up the Ziegfeld Theatre, where it's been putting on color tv presentations. The network has owned the Hudson for more than 12 years, having purchased it for $595,000 from a syndicate including playwrights Howard Lindsay and Russell Crouse, producer Leland Hayward, actors Robert Montgomery and Elliot Nugent and show backer and tobacco dealer Howard Cullman.

The loss again of the Hudson as a Broadway legit house will reduce the number of regular Main Stem theatres to 33.

'VALKYRIE' IN TORONTO; RETURN OF JON VICKERS

Toronto, Jan. 2.

Jon Vickers, of the Met Opera, and Teresa Stratas, who got their start with the Canadian Opera Co., will sing at next year's engagement of the company at O'Keefe Centre (Oct. 3-27), according to Herman Geiger-Torel, general director.

Vickers takes the lead in Wagner's "Die Valkyrie," first time believed done in Toronto, and will sing in German. He was last heard with the Canadian company in "Carmen," participated in the Canadian National Exhibition grandstand show this year. Miss Stratas appears in "Madame Butterfly."

Louis Quilico will sing the title-role of "Rigoletto," this and "Butterfly" in Italian. Apart from leads, cast has not been set, with "Hansel and Gretl"—in English—as fourth of the Canadian quartet.

Walter Susskind, baton-wielder of the Toronto Symphony, conducts the Wagner opera, with staging by Geiger-Torel.

A dramatization of "The Inquisitors," a novel by Polish author Goegr Andrzeyevski, is planned for New York production by Charles Gregory, Joe Darion and Ninon Tallon Karlweis.

Straight Plays Get Into the Chips; 'Shot,' 'Seasons,' 'Take Her' Recoup

Investment coin on Broadway can still be recovered at a rapid pace despite the burdensome economics of present-day legit. Thus far this season, "Shot in the Dark" and "Man for All Seasons" have hit paydirt in a matter of weeks and another new entry, "Take Her, She's Mine," is likely to move into the black during its sixth week in New York.

"Take Her," the Phoebe and Henry Ephron comedy produced by Harold S. Prince, was capitalized at $185,000 and cost around $85,000 to open Dec. 21 at the Biltmore Theatre, N.Y. A pre-production sale of the film rights to 20th-Fox for a down payment of $150,000 gives the production $54,000 on paper as its 40% share, less 10% commissions of that revenue. In addition, the production gets about $4,000 as its share of a $10,000 advance on the sale of the stock and amateur rights to the property.

The $58,000 from the down payment on the picture deal and the advance royalty on the sale of the stock and amateur rights, when deducted from the $85,000 cost of opening the production on Broadway, leaves a deficit of around $27,000. The sale of the film rights also calls for payments by 20th of 10% of the gross on profitable weeks, up to a ceiling of $350,000. The production's share of that income is again 40%.

"Take Her," in its first full stanza at the Biltmore last week, played to a healthy take of $33,265. The operating profit at that level is figured to be around $5,000, with the production getting around another $1,300 as its share of the film bonus payment. The deficit on film bonus payment.

If the show, now in its third week at the Biltmore, holds to its

Hope Springfield, Mass., Will Still Get Tourers

Daniel J. Maloney, promoter-pressagent in Springfield, Mass., is working out an arrangement to book touring legit shows into the Paramount Theatre there next season. The film house was used the last two seasons for legit offerings toured by the Broadway Theatre Alliance, but the local Broadway Theatre League was unable to continue the booking of shows this semester because of financial difficulties.

Springfield has been without regular facilities for legit since the Court Square Theatre was torn down several years ago.

'Lady'-'No Strings' Impasse Recalls 'Oklahoma' Tiff

The refusal of Herman Levin to withdraw his long-running production of "My Fair Lady" from the Hellinger Theatre, N. Y., to make way for a scheduled March 1 opening at the house of the Richard Rodgers-Samuel Taylor musical, "No Strings," is reminiscent of a similar situation on Broadway 14 years ago. That incident also involved a Rodgers musical, but with the situation reversed.

A shortage of Main Stem musical houses during the 1947-48 season resulted in the Shuberts serving an eviction notice in December on "Oklahoma," which was nearing its fifth anniversary at the St. James Theatre. The Shuberts claimed the musical, which Rodgers and his late collaborater, Oscar Hammerstein 2d, adapted from Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs," had fallen below a specified $18,000 stop limit and therefore could be evicted from the house.

The Theatre Guild, producer of "Oklahoma" refused to accept the exit notice, claiming that for the week the gross had fallen below the stop limit, 104 "misplaced" tickets for the Saturday night performance were subsequently found, which would have brought the take for the stanza over $18,000. The dispute was settled and "Oklahoma," passing the five-year mark, continued at the St. James until the following May.

The "Oklahoma" run at the St. James was a record for a Broadway musical until its 2,212-performance mark was passed by "Lady" last summer. In the case of the Levin presentation of the Alan Jay Lerner-Frederick Loewe adaptation of Bernard Shaw's "Pygmalion," the owners of the Hellinger, Max and Stanley Stahl, claim the booking contract for the show permits its eviction from the theatre if the gross falls below $35,000 for

Plan Coast Equity Meet To Study Higher Scales For Low-Gross Houses

Hollywood, Jan. 2.

Legit producers, already howling over increased Actors Equity minimum scales for rehearsals for local off-Broadway groups, may be smacked with additional regulations and costs when the Hollywood Area Committee meets shortly to consider other conditions here.

The union's Coast rep, Lee Harris, has noted that there has been no change in salaries for actors since the present contract was signed March 1, 1959. He says the committee will review the situation at the meeting he will schedule sometime after Jan. 10, when he returns from vacation.

"One thing you can bet," he asserts, "is that we are not going to meet to lower salaries. We want to give both the actor and producer a fair shake and we will study the new New York off-Broadway contracts with this idea in mind."

Harris says that some producers have charged Equity with "giving different deals to different theatres. We do, but always under our current contract rules." For example, Harris cites Equity's tilting of salaries of the cast for "Little Mary Sunshine," which moved from Le Grand Theatre to the Music Box. The raise was from $50 to $75 weekly.

The reason for the boost, Harris explains, is the size of the Music Box and its location. "While the theatre couldn't be classed under our production contract, it was too big for our Hollywood contract," he declares.

Harris points out that under the Hollywood contract, little theatres are classed according to their potential gross. For houses with under $3,000 capacity, the minimum salary is $40 weekly; between $3,000 and $5,000 gross, the minimum salary is $50. For houses over $4,500 capacity, the union exec notes, the salary is $50, plus 20% of the gross over $4,500, with the percentage money divided equally among all Equity members of the cast.

Minimums for full scale productions are $112.50, with a road show scale of $145. Other Equity rules include weekend contracts which call for $10 a performance.

The Night of the Iguana

Charles Bowden presentation of drama in two acts (three scenes) by Tennessee Williams. Staged by Frank Corsaro; settings, Oliver Smith; lighting, Jean Rosenthal; costumes, Noel Taylor; sound effects, Edward Beyer; associate producer, Viola Rubber. Stars Bette Davis, Margaret Leighton, Alan Webb; features Patrick O'Neal. Opened Dec. 28, '61, at the Royale Theatre, N.Y.; $6.90 top weeknights, $7.50 Friday and Saturday nights.

Although the subject matter of "The Night of the Iguana" is squalid, the underlying theme of the drama is tender and the quality of much of the writing is exalted. The new Tennessee Williams play, which opened last week at the Royale Theatre, is eloquently acted, particularly by Margaret Leighton, with expressive assists by Bette Davis, Patrick O'Neal and Alan Webb. The combination, plus the Williams name, should mean an adequate run, and there's probably also a picture in the material, if skillfully adapted.

In this newest work, which he says is his last for Broadway, Williams is again combining decadence of content with the agony of loneliness, and he is writing in his most glowing style. As always, his principal interest is in his feminine characters. In this case the central situation involves a struggle between an epitome of cruel, possessive aggressiveness and a person of passive, helpless sensitivity.

"The Night of the Iguana" is located in a ramshackle resort hotel in a small town on the west coast of Mexico in 1940. An iguana, incidentally, is a large lizzard, the meat of which is regarded as a delicacy by Mexicans. The play's title refers to such a reptile supposedly tied under the hotel porch, to be fattened up and then eaten.

Figuratively, the iguana apparently symbolizes defenseless beings in the hands of cruel captors, and specifically it may also represent the depraved ex-minister held reluctantly in the power of the predatory hotel proprietress. At the end, a spinster artist guest persuades the ex-preacher to release the iguana, thereby symbolically freeing him spiritually from the proprietress.

"Night of the Iguana" is thus another Williams study of the mutual need of the lonely and helpless. In this instance, the subject of the struggle between passiveness and aggressiveness is the depraved but sympathetic figure of the unfrocked pastor. The proprietress wants him for physical reasons and the artist is drawn to him by spiritual kinship.

As usual with Williams' plays, the aggressor wins, and the lost lady artist is left alone and desolate but dignified and erect, with the body of her aged poet-grandfather. Unlike others of the author's works, however, the accent is not on the sordid and sadistic, although those qualities are present, but the pervading impression is strangely satisfying and even to some extent uplifting. Presumably for shock value and as boxoffice come-on, there is the usual Williams element of perversion.

"Iguana" is anything but a perfect play. It has been several years reaching the Broadway stage, having been originally written as a one-acter, expanded to full-length, given a stock troyout in Florida and having undergone drastic revisions, right up to last week's opening. It appears to have been altered in conception, for the first act is cluttered with nonessential characters and incidents, and not until the final scenes does interest focus on the wispy relationship between the spinster and the ex-preacher.

Miss Leighton gives an eloquent, incandescent performance in the quiet, slowly-emerging, compelling and touching role of the native Nantucket spinster artist, although the background of the character remains unexplained and shadowy. Although she has shed most of her British accent, she doesn't suggest the native New Englander the script specifies, even allowing for the fact that the woman and her senile grandfather have been touring the world for years. That's pretty perfectionism, however, considering the virtuoso quality of the star's playing as a whole.

Bette Davis, with gaudy red hair, blue jeans, brazenly unbuttoned shirt and vulgar interests and vocabulary, offers a vivid portrayal of the contentedly widowed hotel owner. English character actor Alan Webb, third-starred, adds an expertly etched characterization of the decrepit old hack poet who finally satisfies his creative urge before expiring, and Patrick O'Neal is agreeably direct and forceful as the ex-minister.

There are also notable secondary performances by Patricia Roe as an indignant lady tourist, Lane Bradbury as one of the ex-preacher's under-age conquests, and Bruce Glover, Laryssa Lauret, Heinz Hohenwald and Lucy Landau as venomously drawn Nazi travelers.

The staging is credited to Frank Corsaro, who withdrew during the tryout tour. Oliver Smith has designed a brilliantly broken down setting of the hotel porch, with several doorways and a lushly scenic backdrop, and Noel Taylor has provided theatrically effective costumes.

Although "Iguana" is not one of Williams' most distinguished plays, it is engrossing and in its concluding scenes, when it holds the audience in enthralled silence, it is emotionally rewarding.

Lawrence of Arabia, the celebrated British army hero and enigma of World War I, is the subject of "Ross," Terence Rattigan's continuing London success which opened last week at the Eugene O'Neill Theatre. Legit-film star John Mills is making his American stage debut in the title part originated in the West End by Alec Guinness and currently being played there by Michael Bryant.

The show's title is the name taken by the baffling hero when he joined the Royal Air Force in 1922 as an enlisted man, in an attempt to find refuge from public attention and perhaps from his own sense of shame. To the American public, whose knowledge of T. E. Lawrence may be vague or virtually non-existent, "Ross" will probably have considerably less interest than it does for English audiences. Also, Mills is not an established name here.

All of which suggests that this David Merrick import is likely to be more of an artistic or intellectual success than a popular of financial hit. Also because of its subject matter, the drama is questionable material for pictures, since the rather cryptic situation involves a suggestion of homosexuality not easily translated into screen terms.

The opening and closing scenes of the three-act play are located at an RAF station near London, where Ross's identity is discovered and he is dropped from the service. Most of the play's action, however, occurs in the Middle East and shows Lawrence's spectacularly successful organization of Arab resistance to the Turks. By the use of maps, spoken explanation and in the relationships of the characters, the background of the World War I in that area is clarified for ill-informed audiences.

Prairie Saloon

Hela Gerber presentation of musical comedy in three acts, with book by Heinz Wunderlich, music by Lotar Olias, lyrics by Wunderlich and Kurt Schwabach. Staged by Ilo von Janko; settings and costumes, Werner Viktor Toeffling; musical direction, Olaf Bienert; choreography, Erwin Bredow. Opened Nov. 10, '61, at the Berliner Theatre, West Berlin; $3 top.

Although musicals generally haven't done well in Germany in recent years, "Prairie Saloon," a home-grown tuner of no special merit has suddenly clicked in Berlin. The local production is an updated version of "Prairie Saloon" which was done no particular success at several smaller West German theatres a couple of years ago. The new version is one of the surprise hits of the West Berlin's legit season.

It's the biggest success the Berliner Theatre could register in a long time. Due to this house's other commitments, "Prairie Saloon" closes there Dec. 31. Tickets up to that date have been sold out long in advance.

It's hard to say what are the basic reasons for the overwhelming audience success. It may be that this little musical benefits from the outstanding public and critical response of "My Fair Lady," which has broken the musical ice in the city.

"Prairie Saloon" is billed as a western musical. It pokes fun at all the characters familiar via Hollywood westerns, including gunfighters, a masculine saloon proprietress, a sultry saloon songstress, a corrupt sheriff, a has-been physician, a stupid barkeeper, a couple of greenhorns, etc. As on the screen, the villains are the loosers.

The plot, of course, is of little importance. The main thing is the musical frame. "Saloon" features a dozen of songs which, chiefly due to their amusing lyrics, come off quite well.

Ingrid van Bergen, the show's headliner, is right at home with her role of a sultry saloon chirp. With her hoarse voice and sexy appearance, she imitates Marlene Dietrich's style. Wolfgang Lukschy enacts a bandit with equally good results. Others who stand out are oldtimer Ewald Wenck as the corrupt sheriff, Ethel Reschke as the resolute saloon proprietress and Klaus W. Krause as a rundown doctor. Ilo von Janko has staged with a sure hand. The colorful setting of a Prairie Saloon is good.

Leonard Sillman's New Faces of '62

New Haven, Dec. 29.

Carroll and Harris Masterson presentation of review in two acts (36 numbers) with music and lyrics by June Carroll, Arthur Siegel, David Rogers, Mark Bucci, Jack Holmes, Murray Grand, Ronny Graham, Marie Gordon, Mav s Moore, Astor Piazzolla, Michael McWhinney, William Roy, John Kander, Joey Carter, Richard Maury, Elisse Boyd, Jim Fuerst, and sketches by Ronny Graham, Paul E. Lynde, Jean Shepherd, Richard Maury, Joey Carter, David Rogers, Bruce Williamson, Herbert Hartig, Tony Geiss, Lee Wainer, Howard Harris, Arnie Sultan, Marvin Worth. Overall staging by Leonard Sillman; sketches staged by Richard Maury; choreographers, Todd Bolender, Vassili Lambrinos; settings and lighting, Marvin Reiss; costumes, Thomas Becher; orchestrations, Jay Bower, Mark Bucci, Sy Oliver, Ted Royal. David Terry; dance music arrangements, Jack Holmes; musical director, Abba Bogin; production manager, Jacqueline Adams. Opened Dec. 28, '61, at the Shubert Theatre, New Haven; $6.50 top.

Cast: Charles Barlow, R. G. Brown, Joey Carter, Jim Corbett, Juan Carlos Copes, Michael Fesco, Travis Hudson, Helen Kardon, Patti Karr, Vassili Lambrinos, Sylvia Lord, Erin Martin, Marian Mercer, James Moore, Maria Nieves, Jean Shepherd, Sylvia, Joan Thornton, Mickey Wayland.

This latest edition of "New Faces" got off to a premiere that must have given its backers a bad case of jitters as one supposedly comic bit after another fell flat and the negative elements so cluttered up the program that they dulled any potential enthusnasm for the better material.

For the opener, in its three-hour (with one intermission) span, everything was tossed into the show, and there were just too many blanks. The premiere was bogged down by too much drivel and how most of it ever got beyond the audition stage is something only a director might explain.

There is about 60% of a show here. The balance is in the maybe and definitely-not categories. There's an abundance of performing talent, but in too many instances the new faces are wearing old hat material. It's a case of the performing personnel outdistancing the creative group.

Heading the troupe, in point of activity, are R. G. Brown and Marian Mercer, who bear the burden of selling most of the skits They're both very good in a variety of roles. Others who indicate potentials that should shine when and if the show really gets rolling are Joey Carter with droll comedy; Mickey Wayland and Patti Karr on looks and comedic flair, Helen Kardon as a neat vocalizer and Travis Hudson as a personable singer-comedienne.

Vassili Lambrinos is double-billed as a choreographer and singer. He fares okay in the terps assignment, but an attempt at a Chevalier-Carl Brisson foreign accent type of vocalist just doesn't jell. Jean Shepherd also does double duty as scripter and performer. His strong point is the latter, with most of his scrivening monologs emerging pretty flat.

Sylvia Lord is a stunning looker, but her three solos unfurl a tremulous voice that seems better suited to intimate nite clubs than a sizable theatre. Juan Carlos Copes and Maria Nieves offer a good dance specialty.

A first hearing rates score as serviceable but undistinguished. Showing possibilities are "I Was Beautiful," a satirical ditty called "Happiness," a plaintive melody labelled "ABC's," a torchy "The Other One," a lively "I Want You to Be the First One to Know," a nostalgic "Atlantic City by the Sea" and a ballad trio called "Aletha."

In an effort toward topicality, there's a pair of dubious bits in a "Togetherness" quartet and a Cuban ballet number. The former, in which the spiritual leaders of four major denominations declaim special attributes for their own flocks, may seem in poor taste to some audiences.

Expendable material includes "They Never Let It Get Out," "Nora," "If You Don't Know the Language," "Museum," "Little Orphan Annie," "Madison Avenue Executive," the majority of a series of "Quickie" blackouts, and a "Guest Star" bit after the fall of the first act curtain. "Pie in the Sky" is a weak sister skit. "It Depends On How You Look At Things" needs clarification and an "It Takes a Heap" sketch requires a stiff workover.

The production is somewhat sparse in scenery, but has one glamor display in a colorful money number. The costumes are attractive, in some instances lush.

Sometimes a comparatively few brilliant segments inserted in the right spots in an unimpressive revue can be the ingredients that whip the whole thing into shape. That could well be the case with this newest edition of "New Faces." There is a breakin month in which to accomplish it.

The Maids and Zoo Story

Chicago, Dec. 19.

Bernard Sahlins, Paul Sills & Howard Alk presentation of two one-act plays, "The Maids," by Jean Genet, and "The Zoo Story," by Edward Albee. Staged by Lawrence Arrick; settings by John Holabird. Opened Dec. 12, '61, at Playwrights at Second City, Chicago; $3.50 top.

THE ZOO STORY

Jerry ..... James Patterson
Peter ..... Thomas Erhart

Playwrights at Second City represents about all there is in Chicago of a professional off-Broadway movement, after moderate success with two original presentations, the company is offering the Windy City debuts of two "new wave" playwrights much discussed in cerebral circles. Jean Genet's "The Maids" will probably do as much to keep business away as Edward Albee's "Zoo Story" will attract it. What is proven with this tandem offering is that the Playwrights group has an abundance of fresh acting talent and that it is capable of first-rate production at the off-Broadway level.

The local mounting of the Albee one-acter must certainly compare favorably with any previous productions of the play. Pointedly staged by Lawrence Arrick, it begins as fatuous conversation and builds in dramatic intensity to a stunning finish. The performances by the cast of two are choice. James Patterson is arresting as the strange young man desperate for communication, and Thomas Erhart indelibly enacts the "normal" soul who hears him out and then faces the horror of an unwitting murder.

"Maids" offers only an intellectual experience, not an emotional one, and it grows tiresomely talky. There are competent performances by Donna Holabird, Rose Deitch and Rochelle Oliver, but they are not sufficient to make the cabaret seats seem softer.

tion, Mills gives an impressively dimensioned and varied portrayal of the puzzling Lawrence, first as as blend of "humility, arrogance and flippancy," and then after his demoralizing ordeal of enforced homosexual experience while the prisoner of the Turks, as the self-loathing fugitive from the public eye. The actor does not here project star magnetism, however.

John Williams gives another of his expertly suave performances as the intelligent and drily witty General Allenby. Geoffrey Keen is skillfully loathesome as the sadistic Turkish military governor, Anthony Nicholls is persuasive as a tolerant British diplomat, Court Benson is convincing as a spitefully jealous British army officer, and there are graphic supporting bits by Paul Sparer as an Arab chief, Cal Bellini and Joseuh Della Sorte as devoted Arab bodyguards, and Robert Milli, Ted Guenther, James Valentine and James Craven as assorted RAF members.

The elaborate scenery by Motley is atmospheric and flexible. Altogether, "Ross" is an interesting addition to the Broadway season, but only a moderate prospect for a successful run. Hobe.

Mr. Barney ..... Joe Hill

Singers; Helen Baisley, Vicki Belmonte, Bob Gorman, Stokely Gray, Joe Hill, Robert Howard, Jeannine Michael, Bruce Payton, Anthony Saverino, Joan Shelley, Ruth Shepard.

Dancers: Diane Ball, Carlos Bas, Michael Bennett, Pepe de Chazza, Sari Clymas, Joel Craig, Robert Evans, Ted Forlow, Valerie Harper, Reby Howells, Gene Kelton, Victoria Mansfield, Wendy Nickerson, Larry Requimore, Sandra Roveta, Ron Stratton, Dean Tallaferro, Jim Weiss.

Musical numbers: "Subways Are for Sleeping," "Girls Like Me," "Station Break," "I'm Just Taking My Time," "I Was a Shoo-In," "Subway Directions," "Ride Through the Night," "Who Knows What Might Have Been," "Swing Your Projects," "Strange Duet," "I Said It and I'm Glad it," "Be a Santa," "Subway Incident," "How Can You Describe a Face?" "I Just Can't Wait," "Comes Once in a Lifetime," "What Is This Feeling in the Air?"

It's a truism of the theatre that when the basic idea of a show is right, everything seems to fall into place. It follows, too, that if the premise is wrong everything is apt to go to pieces.

That may be the explanation for "Subways Are for Sleeping," a woebegone musical which opened last week at the St. James Theatre. Betty Comden and Adolph Green, a coupie of sharp librettist-lyricist talents, and Jule Styne, who can compose smash tunes when circumstances are salubrious, have been trapped in a Saroyanesque bit of whimsy in this new effort, and the result is painful.

"Subways Are for Sleeping" is based on a book, apparently a rather fey book, by Edmund G. Love. The premise is that there's something quixotically appealing about the misfits and derelicts who scrounge an existence in the streets of the big city by day and doze in subways and museums by night. It's a picaresque notion, utterly unsuited to the sophisticated, comically skeptic viewpoints of Comden and Green, and probably also of Styne.

Very little comes out right in this song and dance mismatch of creative elements. The story seems contrived, the characters synthetic, the two romances forced and even the musical numbers tend to seem derivative and flat. By way of defrosting the cake, "Subways" is also dubious screen material. But maybe Comden and Green will be able to salvage some of the material in their next "Party" record album.

Sydney Chaplin and Carol Lawrence are costarred in the show. He plays a sort of unbellicose vagabond king of the drifters, serving as a walking, or more properly lounging, clearing house of information about available odd jobs and free sleeping quarters. She portrays a bright young magazine writer who foregoes a European vacation to do a story on the rag-tag ring and falls in love with the head man.

Comden and Green, as well as Styne, have probably seen every musical done on Broadway in the last 25 years, and in "Subways" their memories are showing. It's astonishing how three such inventive and vigorous talents could turn out such trite, ordinary material. There are only two notable numbers, both done by the secondary leads and both chiefly distinguishable merely by comparison to the generally ho-hum other songs.

Significantly, both of the attention-getting turns are satirical, in contrast to the overall story tone. "I Was a Shoo-in," a spoof of southern glamor girls, enables Phyllis Newman to animate the first act briefly, if not with particular professional finish. "I Just Can't Wait," a parody of romantic ballads, allows Orson Bean to animate the second act with his somewhat special brand of drollery.

Chaplin is lost, apparently without too much of a struggle on his part, in the uncharacteristic guise of the world-weil-lost hobo chief. Miss Lawrence, with a taped knee that doesn't seem to limit her cavorting unduly, appears out of character as the soft, susceptible feature writer who chucks her assignment and job for love at first sight. Bean and Miss Newman are mildly amusing but dispensible, and no one else matters much one way or the other.

Michael Kidd's staging and choreography are energetic and not notably meaningful. Will Steven Armstrong's scenery and lighting are acceptable and Freddy Wittop's costumes are passable. Although a great deal of thought and time and effort and money have gone into "Subways," the result is little more than a loud thud. Hobe.

Vidal and Duerrenmatt Prefer Comedy to Love

Philadelphia, Jan. 2.

Gore Vidal, whose "Romulus" is playing a pre-Broadway tryout at the Walnut St. Theatre, is based on a comedy by Friederich Duerrenmatt, cleared the situation in which one playwright does another's work.

"Duerrenmatt doesn't write English and we met a couple of years ago in Germany. Both he and I liked the idea of having another dramatist do the play instead of handing it over to a translater.

"All American authors seem to be concerned with one theme—love. Duerrenmatt, I discovered, was a congenial soul. He doesn't consider that the ultimate in drama is whether the man gets the girl or not. He was more interested in ideas. We also felt that that comedy is the best way to get across a serious point."

Vidal said he usually works on a play while it is in rehearsal, but always has the end in view whenever he undertakes a work.

Translator Pushes Suit Over Production of 'Egg'

Robert Schlitt, denied a temporary injunction to block the scheduled opening next Monday night (8) of "The Egg" at the Cort Theatre, N.Y., is still pressing his legal battle with Alexander Ince, co-producer of the play. Besides seeking the injunction, Schlitt, "translator" of the Felicien Marceau comedy, instituted suit in N.Y. Supreme Court charging Ince with fraud in relation to an alleged promise to sign a Dramatists Guild contract.

In regard to the fraud allegation, Schlitt sought an accounting based on a Guild contract, plus a permanenf injunction to halt the production until the dispute was settled. N.Y. Supreme Court Justice Arthur Markewich ruled against the request for the accounting and the temporary injunction. In dismissing the action for an accounting, the court gave Schlitt the right to file an amended complaint.

Such a plea, retaining the fraud allegation and request for a permanent injunction, is to be filed by Schlitt's attorney, Gerald L. Wapner, of the N.Y. law firm of Wapner, Rankow & Cohen. In the amended suit, a definite amount of money will be sought.

"The Egg" completed a five-week tryout at the Civic Theatre, Chicago, last Sunday night (31).

Plan 28-Week Schedule For Allenberry Theatre

The Allenberry Playhouse, Boiling Springs, Pa., will probably have a 28-week season starting next April 23. A program of 11 straight plays, each running two weeks, and three musicals, each running three weeks, is planned for the lenethy semester, scheduled to end Nov. 3.

Richard North Gage is managing director of the operation.

Plays Pay Off

present pace, it can move into the black during the week of Jan. 22. The backers were repaid $45,000 of their investment the day following the New York opening of the comedy, in which Art Carney and Phyllis Thaxter costar.

"Man" completed recovery of its $60,000 investment last week, its sixth on Broadway. The rapid move into the black, in itself unusual for a present-day Main Stem drama, is even more phenomenal in the case of the Robert Bolt play, since it reflects operating profit only and does not take in any such subsidiary income as a film sale.

The American National Theatre & Academy presentation of the Robert Whithead-Roger L. Stevens production cost about $58,000 to put on. A small operating profit was earned by the production during its out-of-town tryout, but pre-opening expenses brought the cost to around $60,000. The show has been playing to sock business at the ANTA Theatre, N.Y., where its weekly operating profit has ranged from about $11,000 to $16,000.

At its potential weekly capacity take of $48,577, "Seasons," in which top-star Paul Scofield is repeating the part he originated in London, can clear approximately $17,000. Costarring in the vehicle with Scofield are George Rose and Thomas Gomez, the latter as successor to Leo McKern. The backers are to be repaid their entire investment tomorrow (Thurs.).

With "Seasons" a hot ticket, the ANTA, formerly the Guild Theatre, has put its old boxoffice in the outer lobby back into use to enable the racking of tickets for a 30-week period. The ticket counter in the inner lobby, in use since the house was refurbished and renamed the ANTA in 1954, has been closed. It's facilities permitted the racking of tickets for a period of only 10-12 weeks.

"Shot," now in its 12th week at the Booth Theatre, N.Y., was in the black by the end of its fourth frame at the house. As previously reported in VARIETY, coin from the pre-production sale of the film rights to the Harry Kurnitz adaptation of Marcel Achard's "L'Idiote" contributed substantially to the rapid recovery of the $75,000 investment in the Leland Hayward production, in which Julie Harris stars.

Opera and Concert Reviews

Opera

Galina Vishnevskaya

("Butterfly," Met Opera, N. Y.)

The Russian soprano brought over by Sol Hurok appeared in her second Met role, that of Puccini's Madama Butterfly, on the same evening (5) the musical bon ton was at Carnegie Hall to witness the American Opera Society's gala with Joan Sutherland, this season's vocal sensation. If the subscription audience was slow to stir itself to enthusiasm, it was still clear at the finale that Mme. Vishnevskaya had sung the Japanese heroine quite beautifully.

Russian concepts of operatic acting are restrained. There is a minimum of the Oriental fluttering of head and eyes, mincing of steps in her performance. She is less convincingly Japanese than many another who sings the role at the Met but the voice is warm and well-produced, and not tired up top. Taken in combination with her "Aida," Mme. Vishnevskaya tenure at the house has been very pleasing, though not setting the buffs on their ears. Land.

Concert

Philadelphia Orchestra

(Carnegie Hall, N. Y.)

Philadelphia Orchestra, one of the "Big Three" in eastern symphonic ensembles since the early years of this century, is in the fortunate position of being able to program almost anything and still attract a full house to its New York concerts. Yet, it must be stated that Eugene Ormandy, the musical director, accepts his responsibilities with seriousness and integrity, and invariably bills works of interest and importance.

A recent Carnegie Hall manifestation included such staples of the repertoire as Haydn's "Clock" Symphony and Beethoven's fifth piano concerto ("Emperor") with that cultured exchangist, Van Cliburn, as soloist. The maestro who rose from the Capitol Theatre pit to eminence as one of the world's foremost conductors also listed a New York premiere. Richard Yardumian's first symphony.

Yardumian, an American of Armenian descent, is that rarity—a contemporary native composer whose work is frequently appearing on programs of major orchestras. He's still in his forties, but already has gained recognition and acceptance as a composer with something to say. During the current season, some 30 orchestras are listing Yardumian compositions. His "Armenian Suite," concerto for piano, a piece for tenor and orchestra, all have been recorded by Columbia Records. The revised version of his violin concerto and the first symphony are scheduled for March release, also by Columbia.

Yardumian, of course, has benefitted from the blessing of Ormandy, who obviously believes in his work and has commissioned several pieces. A virile, prolific artist, Yardumian has fathered about two dozen major scores, and 13 children. His work has been played by orchestras of Detroit, Indianapolis, Denver, Houston, Kansas City and others. His "Armenian Suite," has been performed a score of times by Ormandy and is used as the musical signature for "Voice of America" broadcasts beamed beyond the Iron Curtain.

Yardumian's symphony at its Carnegie premiere enjoyed a better reception than is given most contemporary works. It employs a large orchestra and holds interest throughout. It is tuneful, yet has its dissonant passages and the musical language is one readily acceptable. Ormandy conducted with the conviction born of sincerity and his players brought great beauty to the peaceful, lyrical passages and dramatic intensity to the symphony's more climactic moments.

Prior to the Yardumian, the Philadelphians performed a most tasteful delivery of the Haydn "Clock" and Cliburn brought the evening to a close with a virtuosic interpretation of the "Emperor." The concert balanced the new with the old, and each was a triumph enjoyed by the payees. Wien.

Plan Cuffo Legit Shows In Prospect Park, B'klyn; Seek 30G Fund, Subsidy

Brooklyn's Prospect Park may follow Manhattan's Central Park as a summer showcase for free legit presentations. A plan to bring no-admission theatre to Prospect Park was disclosed recently at a meeting in the Brooklyn chambers of Supreme Court Justice John E. Cone, co-chairman with actress Dina Merrill of the committee for the venture.

The founder of the project is Kenneth N. Whitlock, producer of the Brooklyn Public Library Poetry & Drama Ensemble. Unlike the N. Y. Shakespeare Festival in Central Park, the Prospect Park enterprise does not hinge on the presentation of Shakespearean plays, but will include vintage and contemporary works.

The season is to run from July 4 through Labor Day. Professional actors are to be employed at the prevailing Broadway minimum for members of Actors Equity. An initial fund-raising goal of $30,000 has been set for the Brooklyn project and a city subsidy will be sought for additional coin.

'TASTE' REMITS $12,000; HAS NOW REPAID 90%

The repayment of the investment in the David Merrick production of "Taste of Honey" was hiked to over 90% last month with the distribution of another $12,000 to the backers of the Shelagh Delaney drama. The divvy brought to $60,000 the total thus far repaid the investors on their $66,000 stake.

The deficit on the production, which began touring following the conclusion last Sept. 9 of a 49-week Broadway run, was reduced to $1,122 as of last Dec. 2. However, the play, in which Hermione Beddeley and Frances Cuka costar, is figured to have suffered a substantial loss the week of Dec. 4-9 in New Haven on a gross of $10,476. Business was better the following week in Baltimore, but additional coin was expended on a Dec. 20-25 layoff.

Revenue earned by the production, which Merrick is presenting by arrangement with Donald Alberry and Oscar Lewenstein Ltd., include $11,200 as the production's share of income from the sale of the film rights by the management of the original British presentation.

Arrange Genevieve Tour In 'Paris' Musical Show

French singer Genevieve will begin a 16-week tour Jan. 14 at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, in a new revue, "From Paris with Love." The vehicle, in which a cast of 14 will appear, is being produced by summer theatre operator Herb Rogers. Dog Driver is writer and director of the revue, which the William Morris Agency is booking.

Among those who'll appear with Genevieve in the offering are Lue Poret, Danny Carroll and Norma Doggett. The production, for which Gershon Kingsley is musical director and James Hamilton set designer, will operate under the jurisdiction of the American Guild of Musical Artists. Art Merrill will be stage manager.

Rogers, who runs the Music Theatre and the Tenthouse Theatre, both in Highland Park, Ill., is due back in New York from a current Coast visit next Tuesday (2). Besides the tour, Rogers is also considering playing the show on the summer theatre circuit. The 16-week tour is scheduled to end April 14 at the Bushnell Auditorium, Hartford, but there's a possibility of the show playing a week in Montreal and a week in Boston after Easter.

A Broadway outing may also develop depending on the road reaction to the offering.

The show is over, but the melodies linger on!

"RICHARD ADLER has written his music and lyrics with bold originality."
John Chapman, N. Y. Daily News

Cue Magazine

"The music by RICHARD ADLER has lilt and life...The music carried the show."
Jack Maher, Billboard

"The songs were inspiring!"
Hy Gardner, N. Y. Herald Tribune

"Superb lyrics and score by RICHARD ADLER."
Radie Harris, Hollywood Reporter

"WHAT'S WRONG WITH ME, ORDINARY PEOPLE, WHAT HAPPENED TO ME TONIGHT and ANOTHER TIME may do for ADLER what such previous hits as HEY THERE, HERNANDO'S HIDEAWAY, LOLA and RAGS TO RICHES have done earlier."
Don Bishop, The Charlotte Observer

"One Broadway musical deserves to be mentioned with serious operatic works...called KWAMINA, with music and lyrics by RICHARD ADLER... There is no denying the impact of the music."
Sigmund Spaeth, General Features

"MR. ADLER has written songs that are alternately romantic, humorous and spirited, among them the COCOA BEAN SONG, NOTHING MORE TO LOOK FORWARD TO, ORDINARY PEOPLE and ANOTHER TIME, ANOTHER PLACE."
Eleanor Hughes, Boston Herald

"RICHARD ADLER has done some outstanding music especially the WELCOME HOME. MISS HOWES has two good ones in WHAT HAPPENED TO ME TONIGHT and ANOTHER TIME, ANOTHER PLACE and there is good humor in ONE WIFE, THE SUN IS BEGINNING TO CROW and SEVEN SHEEP, FOUR RED SHIRTS AND A BOTTLE OF GIN."
Alta Maloney, Boston Traveler

"RICHARD ADLER has invented an astonishing amount and variety of music...ADLER wrote lacy lyrical melodies...There is almost operatic weight in WHAT HAPPENED TO ME TONIGHT and ANOTHER TIME, ANOTHER PLACE. The ONE WIFE number, for women, who express horror at the institution of monogamy on the ground that more wives make less work in one home is pure Broadway show biz. It is also very funny. So is SEVEN SHEEP, FOUR RED SHIRTS AND A BOTTLE OF GIN."
Cyrus Durgin, Boston Globe

"The music and words which range from buoyant to darkly brooding are the work of gifted RICHARD ADLER. MISS HOWES, in excellent voice as usual, sings YOU'RE AS ENGLISH AS with the ring of a hit and she does nice things with ANOTHER TIME, ANOTHER PLACE. ORDINARY PEOPLE and DID YOU HEAR THAT rated the rounds of applause they got. SEVEN SHEEP, FOUR RED SHIRTS AND A BOTTLE OF GIN sums up a court fine as well as the show's fine comedy number. ONE WIFE sung by the native wives is a lament lugubriously assessing the unhappy plight of a woman whose spouse believes in monogamy."
Peggy Doyle, Boston American

"The music by RICHARD ADLER is composed with perceptive power and sentiment."
Ranald Savery, Toronto Star

'Lady' – 'No Strings'

two consecutive weeks, which occurred last February.

However, Levin argues he was not given official notification that the show was to be evicted at that time and therefore the exit notice now has no validity. Levin has instituted legal action to decide the matter.

The producer has also refused to comment on a report that he would vacate the Hellinger if he received 1% of the gross of "No Strings" from the Stahls. The report isn't clear as to whether the 1% would go to Levin personally or to the "Lady" production, in which case it would be split among all those sharing in the show's revenue.

For the first time since last February, the take for "Lady" fell below $35,000 the week before last with the gross for the frame hitting $32,268. However, the take climbed substantially last week. A July 29 accounting of the "Lady" companies on Broadway and the road for the two weeks ending that date reveals the Broadway operation cleared $3,769 on a $47,789 gross and $4,371 on a $46,485 take. The Hellinger's share of the gross is a straight 25%.

The touring company, at the Biltmore Theatre, Los Angeles, during the period covered by the accounting, cleared $12,327 on a $62,911 gross and $11,195 on a $63,069 take. Royalty payments on each of the two companies, as disclosed in the audit, are 5% to Lerner and Loewe, 3% to the late Moss Hart as director, 3% to the Shaw estate, 1% to choreographer Hanya Holm and 1% to estate of Gabriel Pascal, who produced a film edition of "Pygmalion."

The total netted by the two-company operation as of the July 29 statement was $7,951,129 on an investment by CBS only of $360,000. The distributed profit, as of that date, was $7,665,518.

Hardly Seems Worth It

Minneapolis, Jan 2.

Lorraine Egypt receives $200 a week for doing her bellydance in Broadway drama, "Gideon." When she previously played Freddie's, a local supper club, her pay was $950 per week. In some niteries her salary was even higher. That's what she told Minneapolis Morning Tribune columnist Will Jones when he interviewed her during his recent trip to New York.

"I'm losing all kinds of money," the local scribe quoted the dancer as saying when he talked with her backstage, at the Plymouth Theatre, N. Y. "But I think being in a Broadway hit show may help my career in the long run," explained Miss Egypt. "I gave my notice two weeks ago, but they gave me a better contract—not more money or better billing. However, by the insertion of a hard-to-explain clause in the contract. Besides, I'm starting to pick up some extra money at club dates and conventions on weekends."

The dancer started with a small speaking part in "Gideon," but director Tyrone Guthrie gradually reduced the role to one seductive belly dance, which is supposed to tempt Gideon and gain mercy for her father, as one of the elders of Succoth, she told Jones.

possibility of a vaude revival throughout the country. The date-diggers point out that the names now wanted by the tents are virtually the same that are in demand for legit-type stands in the hardtops and cafes as well.

But it's more than a change of scenery for the headliners who hit the summer circuits. It's considered exposure to new audiences as well as a bid for greater prestige. The agencies also want to use the canvas dates as a showcase for television specials. Should healthy grosses result, it's an argument for an hour-stand on the video.

The injunction granted last March by the Superior Court of Rhode Island in favor of four paperback publishers — Bantam Books, Dell Publishing Co., Pocket Books and New American Library of World Literature—against the Rhode Island Commission on Youth has been reversed by the Supreme Court of that state.

Judge William M. Mackenzie of the Superior Court, after trial, had enjoined the Commission from sending, to wholesalers and retailers of books and magazines, notices stating that in the Commission's opinion specified pubications were objectionable for sale to youth under 18.

The Commission notices had included such statements as "the Chiefs of Police have been given the names of the aforementioned magazines with the order that they are not to be sold, distributed or displayed to youths under 18 years of age. The Attorney General will act for us in cases of non-compliance. The Commissioners trust that you will cooperate with this agency in their work," and "cooperative action will eliminate the necessity of our recommending prosecution to the Attorney General's department." Copies of the notices were sent to all police chiefs and social agencies. Active police followup of these notices had emphasized the risk to sellers in ignoring Commission notices.

The Providence Sunday Journal of Dec. 24, in an editorial criticizing the Supreme Court's decision, described it in part as follows: "The Commission's use of intimidation is sanctioned . . . It may function, in effect, as a kangaroo court." The editorial speculates as to whether the publishers will take the issue to the U.S. Supreme Court and adds "and we hope they do." The Journal has won its hope, for the publishers have indicated that they will ask the high Court to review the case.

The publishers are represented by Horace Manges, of Weil, Gotshal & Manges, of N.Y. City, assisted by Jacob F. Raskin of that firm. Joseph Breen, of Providence, is special counsel for the Youth Commission.

Two From Britain

Two hardy perennials from England, via Macmillan, have appeared again. "Theatre World Annual No. 12" ($5.50), by Frances Stephens, offers year's review of West End, plus customary statistical departments. There are special bios on Albert Finney and Richard Johnson, two particularly popular young British actors of the season. Jacket and frontispiece proffer Dame Peggy Ashcroft as "The Duchess of Malfi."

"Ballet Annual No. 16" ($6), edited by Arnold L. Haskell and Mary Clarke, performs usual excellent task of spotlighting international ballet scene. Articles depict travels of Royal Ballet in U.S.A. and U.S.S.R., ballet in Paris, Hungary, Denmark and Sweden, Commonwealth dancers, a bio of the Marquis de Cuevas, and item on recent Balanchine entries. In addition to criticism, checklists and obits, Arthur Todd submits profile of American Negro dance, rather fully illustrated, including several Carl Van Vechten photos not properly credited. Both tomes maintain high standards and fine traditions of former years. Rodo.

Gordon Chelf, Retires

Both the News and the Inquirer are divisions of Triangle Publications Inc.

CHATTER

North Carolina Medical Society will present a press award to a N.C. newspaper reporter adjudged to have done the outstanding job of reporting medical information in 1961. The award will be $250 and a plaque to the newspaper employing the reporter.

The Morganton (N.C.) News Herald has moved into its new building with a big open house celebration and a special edition honoring the occasion. The new building was a dream of Beatrice Cobb, who published the afternoon daily for 43 years until her death in 1959. The newspaper's executives and trustees of Miss Cobb's estate transformed her dream into a reality.

Pyramid Books' paperback "Let's Twist!" by George Carpozi, Jr., assistant city editor of the N.Y. Journal-American, is a 50c. one-sheet, illustrated with 16 pages of pictures, the story of Joey Dee and the Starliters, Chubby Checker, the Peppermint Lounge and the Wagon Wheel. There's also a special chapter on the Hully-Gully, first performed on the Ed Sullivan show Dec. 10 which some predict will be the next dance fad.

H. Allen Smith, according to Hal Matson, is "just roving through the Fuji and Samoa Islands for the month of January, gathering material for his next book; no specific itinerary or hotels or dates, which is a nice way to be doing it, especially now," adds the author's literary agent.

Albert J. Rosenberg elected a veep of McGraw-Hill Book Co. He had developed the usage of books with films as a valuable teaching aid and became manager of a newly formed text-film department of McGraw-Hill.

Cornelius Vanderbilt Jr. had to interrupt his lecturing itinerary for Redpath; the commentator-globetrotter who had some new films in the Berlin "wall" etc. is still recuping at Crystal Beach, Fla., following an intestinal disturbance which had him hospitalized in Baltimore but, it was found, nonmalignant.

Mother of Mrs. Frank Kane (he's the whodunit author) died suddenly.

Prentice-Hall board of directors declared a common stock dividend of 2½, payable Jan. 31 to stockholders of record Jan. 9, 1962.

'Photocopying'

a photo-engraving machine; whether the copyist is a public library or a business concern."

With new techniques and piracies of constant concern to creators they cannot risk carelessness, though the average public library may consider that it simply rendered a service to a citizen. The fact is that the library has broken the law. Karp points out that once the practice is established it consequences to legitimate publishing and to creative writers, dependent upon royalties payments, could be catastrophic. Again directly quoting Karp:

Serious Dangers Ignored

"The serious dangers of unauthorized library photocopying have been ignored; often on the assumption that authors and publishers run no practical risk from it because of the disproportionate cost of photocopying. The theory is that no one would bother to order a photocopy of a book from a library when he could buy it more cheaply from the publisher. However, once the principle is established, it will apply regardless of cost. The libraries would have the same right to make copies whether their cost is higher than the retail price, or lower.

"If the costs of photocopying are reduced sufficiently, the consequences for text book authors and publishers, as well as all others, could be serious. Fewer books would be sold to public and college libraries, and other institutions, if libraries can fill their readers' requirements by selling photocopies rather than buying additional books for lending. The impact may be felt even earlier in the purchase by libraries, and individual readers, of anthologies and collected works, where the reader's interest is directed towards a particular portion. As, for example, an anthology of plays or historical materials, only a portion of which is used in a college course. The cost of photocopying even long excerpts is low enough now so that they can be produced at less than published prices.

"New innovations are constantly being made in the various methods of photocopying. Heavy treated paper is no longer required — copies can be made on any quality of rag or bond paper. Costs of reproduction have already been brought down quite drastically.

SCULLY'S SCRAPBOOK

By Frank Scully

Palm Springs, Jan. 2.

One thing sure to add a bitter sauce to the otherwise delightful news of Rudy Vallee's success in "How To Succeed In Business Without Really Trying" is any reference to its being a comeback. He belongs to the school of actors who thinks it is a dirty word.

He also thinks he is a purist in speech and grammar and though he has long believed that correcting people's grammar is a sure way to lose friends and fortify enemies he continues to do it.

"Poor speech upsets me terribly," he says. "Why, I don't know, but it does. And since I find it very difficult to be dishonest where honesty and frankness are called for I shall continue. I don't intend to irritate but it hardly is worth winning the friendship of someone whose friendship I probably would not have enjoyed anyway." Though he thinks he has signed more autographs than any actor alive, he thinks he has fewer friends than most.

He once wrote 550 pages of his career in show biz. He called it "My Time Is Your Time," after his theme-song of the same name—probably a plug for Bulova. The manuscript never got a publisher and having read it I could see why.

Maine, where he came from, is a great lumber state, and Rudy, while it doesn't show in his speech, has a lumbering style when it comes to writing. More, it is so full of stilted cliches that you'd think he was ghosting for William McKinley.

It looks now as if he had fallen into a part that fits him like one of the Red Dot stogies. It must have taken an awful lot of wearing down to get him off his Yale high horse into acting like a human being, even a stuffed shirt human being. However, in the years when I knew him best, when he was between successes, I thought he had a lot of charm and was a lot of fun.

He has minded what he calls "a base canard" that he didn't tip at all and has advanced the contention that he's a generous tipper if the service is generous. He adds, "I am always happy to bring from my stores of wines and liquor, my own contribution to the evening's festivities."

This is true. He had quite a cellar. I remember frequent parties we had at Scully's Bedside Manor in Hollywood and one time on hearing that Eugene O'Brien was a neighbor of ours Rudy's eyes brightened. He said Gene was one of his acting idols and he would like to meet the old trouper.

I arranged a dinner for them and I remember Jack Paar and Sheila Graham were there too. We had a pecular housekeeper problem in that we had a Swedish maid at the time who polished mahogany floors till they shone like mirrors. But she couldn't cook for nuts. A former housekeeper, who wasn't in good health but was a great cook, agreed however to come up on Thursdays, which was the Swede's day out, and cook for us.

As all Hollywood was to head for restaurants on Thursday nights, the thought that celebrities could get a good meal at Scullys when their cooks were enjoying a day off, took no effort at all on our part to get up an impressive guest list.

For the Gene O'Brien dinner Vallee came with his bottles and one of them, I remember, was Triple Cream Sherry, a rare and delightful drink. We had a fine dinner. O'Brien and Vallee had a grand time as did everybody else. Later we went out on the terrace and Rudy said, "Let's go up to my place, and I'll fix you some daiquiris."

While we were discussing the idea of going up to his place, the Swedish maid came up the hill and joined us. She talked an excellent English, dressed well, and when she heard the invitation to switch the party to Vallee's she joined in and said, "Yeah, let's."

She was a very democratic gal and since we firstnamed her, she firstnamed us. Neither Vallee nor any of the others had met her before. They just assumed she was a guest who had arrived late, not the maid on her night off.

Vallee telephoned up to his house, which was on a hill above us near Mulholland Drive, and ordered the lights to be put on. Then he guided us around a hill which would give us a good view of the place. It was the long way around but he wanted to impress us.

Recently I read where Liberace bought it but Vallee says that's a lot of nonsense. He still has it and isn't planning to sell it. He bought it from Ann Harding who built it. But that was 25 years ago.

Unfortunately as we rounded the hill, fog rounded the hill with us and blotted out our host's idea of a bright entrance. But once inside his place, things were fine. Below the main house was a tennis court, the roof really of a long building. We went down what looked like miles of Vallee photographs and finally reached the bar.

He soon mixed up his favorite drink and Greta, the Swedish maid, after trying several daiquiris wanted to switch to straight whisky.

Vallee wouldn't give it to her. He insisted mixing drinks would send her reeling and she would have a terrible hangover in the morning as a consequence.

But she insisted, having a whim of iron, and he being a good host finally gave in. It hadn't the slightest effect on her. In fact, the next morning she was up cheerful, polishing floors at 6:30.

But O'Brien couldn't take his pilgrimage so well. He thought the whisky excellent and hugged the remains of a bottle to his chest when it was time to go home. Paar and I took him home. He was really loaded.

To get him to his house Paar got out of the car and held the half-filled bottle of whisky in front of O'Brien and started toward the gate. He lured Gene on as one might lure a mule with a handful of hay. Once he got O'Brien and the bottle inside the gate, Paar closed it on them and rushed to our car.

O'Brien called the next day to thank milady Alice for a beautiful dinner and said he didn't know what had happened to him but he woke up in the morning in the clothes closet.

Of the billposting peculiarities which made Vallee's place in Maine during the days of the Fleischman Hour a collector's item, little remains today. Most of the prohibitions had good sense and it seems in retrospect that his guests in those days must have been boors to need them. Obviously, Vallee suffered from their trespasses or he wouldn't have been forced to put up the signs.

From the day Vallee received $10 in 1914 for singing "The Sunshine of Your Smile" at the home of an executive of a paper mill a mile below Westbrook, Maine, where he was born, from that moment on Vallee was a pro. It is 47 years from that first effort to his success in "How To Succeed In Biz" and in between he's done a mountain of performing in all fields of entertainment.

Broadway is not a new port to him, but it must seem like a sailor home from the seas to a guy who's been nightclubbing for years up and down and across the country, with a wife, two miniature poodles, and a personally invented luggage-carrier that made his town car look like a covered wagon.

The home on the top of Mulholland Drive and the villa at Palm Springs may be missed, but not too much if the waiters at Lindy's tell you you're a hit.

The last time I saw Vallee he had come to pay me a visit at the Methodist Hospital in Houston. He was playing at the Houston Club. He graciously called to find out if I were well enough to have visitors and when the nurses found out who it was, they asked me to please ring my bell and ask for something while he was there because they wanted to be introduced to him.

So you see even during that road-grind he was still considered a hit. So maybe he's right. Maybe this isn't a comeback, just another success in another medium of show biz.

Broadway

Laura Schwartz engaged to New York showbiz accountant Michael Rosenberg.

Nancy B. Zabel, last at the St. Moritz, is now special aide to Hotel Astor general manager-veepee Tony Rey.

Huntington Hartford bought the 12-room, four-story, brownstone town house on East 62d St. from Tallulah Bankhead. It's assessed at $70,000.

Gigi's, the new Yonkers eatery which opened recently, is named after Gigi, the maitre d'hotel at the Latin Quarter. It's operated by his son, Richard Ancona.

Vienna Boys Choir, Metopera tenor Cesare Valetti, concert pianist Clifford Curzon and symphony conductor Vladimir Golschmann in from Europe yesterday (Tues.) on the Queen Elizabeth.

Quite a few of the class restaurants which get their conservative New Year's Eve clientele, did big "preview" business Saturday night because of adhering to their traditional Sunday closing regardless of the Eve falling that night.

All tenants must be out of 277 Park Ave. by Jan. 15. Quite a few show folk involved. Site will become (natch) a commercial building though not with CBS as tenant for 30 of the 50 floors as seemed likely some months ago.

The Xavier Cugats (Abbe Lane) were robbed of $47,000 in furs and jewels and $500 in cash when burglars ransacked their E. 57th St. digs on New Year's Eve, while the duo were working the Starlight Roof of the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria.

Ted Lewis' current engagement at Chi's Edgwater Beach Hotel (for four weeks and one day) is among the last of the MCA bookings; Adah Lewis, his wife and longtime personal manager, recently decided to return to the William Morris agency.

Alonzo Deen Cole, whose "Witch's Tale" ran 14 years on radio and whose "Casey, Crime Photographer" ran seven years on both media has removed himself and family from Newtown, Conn. to Glendale, Cal. to concentrate on the film production there.

Marilyn Hall, who wrote the lyrics to Helen Owens' tunes, for Hildegarde's new act, is the wife of Monty Hall, emcee and tv packager. They reside on the Coast and Mrs. Hall's collaboration with Miss Owens, wife of RCA veepee Ken Bilby, was by correspondence.

Many show bizites reside at the Mayflower Hotel where three lives were lost in a blaze last week. Included are playwright Tad Mosel, producer Arthur Knorr, Leo Fuld, operator of the Sahbra. Carol Channing and husband-manager Charles Lowe, film exploiteer Jack Goldstein and dept. store exec Joe Eckhouse, w.k. in showbiz.

If the retired-to-Florida John (Marian) Byrams can't come to Broadway too often, they make Broadway come to them. Lynn and Nelle Farnol and Brooks Atkinson did the Mahomet-to-Naples, Fla., bit over the holidays. It develops that the N.Y. Timesman is a bird fancier and plans to visit bird sanctuaries in the nearby Everglades.

Along with a new American "industry" having to do with bombshelters or fallout shelters, now there are books being issued on "The Family Survival Handbook." Also, fancy grocery departments in several key cities feature "survival" menus and "the complete survival larder," including drinking water in cans, sewage and other refuse disposal contraptions, etc.

Not generally known, until disclosed in Sidney Fields' N. Y. Mirror "profile" on ASCAP prexy Stanley Adams, is that the lawyer-turned-lyricist is related to Connie Immerman, longtime operator of Harlem's Connie's Inn which, in the Prohibition era, rivalled the Cotton Club as the two top fashionable black-and-tan niteries on the Gotham scene. Immerman encouraged his nephew, Adams, to write lyrics.

After all the hoopla about converting the 51,839-ton 31-year-old French liner, the Liberte, into a floating hotel and/or anchored-at-bay niteries for the Seattle Exposition, the deal to sell it for $3,150,000 went up in scrap—literally. An Italian scrap iron firm bought it for a reported $2,230,000 when the Seattle deal (Ted and Everett Crosby's names were mentioned in it) flopped because of inability to raise the money.

Billy Rose and Joyce Matthews made the headlines with plans to remarry. Former showgirl previously twice divorced Milton Berle, and her first marriage in 1956 to Rose terminated in a divorce two years ago. She has been resident in Lausanne, Switzerland, in recent years, but also of late has been a frequent house-guest at Rose's palatial townhouse in Manhattan. Two days later they made it official—and more space.

Famed Cavanagh's restaurant on West 23d St., along with the Garden Cafeteria (opposite Madison Sq. Garden), Dunhall's in the MBS Bldg. and the Crossroads restaurants in Times Sq., which filed under Chapter XI of the bankruptcy act, will continue operating while terms of setilement are being arranged. In each corporate instance the assets exceed the liabilities. William K. Malester is prez of each operating corporation.

Bruno Zirato, the retired managing director of the N.Y. Philharmonic, who was, in his youth, secretary to Enrico Caruso, is a close student of these columns. Hence he takes a skeptical view of the claim from Vancouver, B.C. in an obituary notice on Piero Orsatti, 76, who died Nov. 28. Statement that Orsatti had recorded arias with Caruso does not check out with Metropolitan Opera Annals covering 1888-1947, where there is no record of Orsatti being on the roster. If he was in the chorus, that's a different matter, of course.

Realtor - hotelier - showman Bill Zeckendorf has just formed the William & Marion Zeckendorf Foundations Inc. as a nonprofit membership corporation for the discovery of unknown artists. Headquarters in the Hotel Chatham, a Webb & Knapp (Zeckendorf) property. Besides Mrs. Zeckendorf, who is identified as an art collector, and her husband, the other three trustees are William C. Warren, dean of Columbia Law School, Allen McNab, director of the Chicago Art Institute, and Richard L. Conolly, president of Long Island Univ.

OBITUARIES

JERRY GIESLER

Jerry Giesler, 75, who presided at the counsel's table of some of Hollywood's most controversial law suits and criminal cases, died Jan. 1 of a heart attack in Beverly Hills. He spent 50 years in the film capital during his legal career and his list of clients included a host of well-knowns from Charlie Chaplin to Mickey Cohen.

Others included the late Errol Flynn, Lana Turner, Robert Mitchum, Marilyn Monroe, Barbara Hutton and Shelley Winters. He was involved in 70 murder trials and none of his clients was executed. His success in the courtroom was due primarily to thorough preparation of cases and an uncanny skill in handling juries.

One of the most publicized trials was that in which Chaplin was charged with violation of the Mann Act in transporting a protegee, Joan Barry, across state lines. Giesler won an acquittal for Chaplin. But later when the actor was represented by another attorney, he lost the paternity case. Giesler also successfully defended Flynn against charges of two teenagers who claimed the actor has seduced them. The case was won despite the testimony of the two girls, plus the presence of nine women on the jury.

Giesler was born in Wilton Junction, Ia., with the square handle of Harold Lee Giesler and began the study of law at the U. of Iowa. However, eye trouble forced him to abandon his studies and he went west where he started as driver of a lumber wagon at $2 daily. He later transferred to the U. of California to complete his legal education.

His bigtime step started with his defense of Alexander Pantages, of the Pantages theatre chain, who was accused of criminally attacking a minor. Giesler was part of the team of attorneys defending him and was used only for cross-examination. Later, when Giesler headed the legal battery, Pantages was acquitted.

He also defended Robert Mitchum in a narcotics case, but the actor was given 60 days. Walter Wanger, who shot McAlte Jennings Lang when he suspected the agent of trying to break up his marriage to Joan Bennett, was also given a jail term. He also defended the 14-year old daughter of Lana Turner who stabbed and killed Miss Turner's friend, Johnny Stompanato. Giesler was married twice. The first union ended in divorce. Surviving are his second wife, a son and two daughters.

Miss Burns, who had been receiving $200 a month from the estate of her late father until the age of 18 and who had gotten $20,000 from the estate, was penniless at the time of her death. She had been arrested for assault with a deadly weapon at one time, but the charge was dismissed.

An admitted narcotics addict, she was under indictment for possession of drugs at the time of her death. She told police that an acquaintance kept her supplied with heroin for a month, then charged her from $15 to $30 daily for drugs.

Hearing it is equivalent to hearing Ludwig van Beethoven conduct his Ninth.

Each of these records is hand made of chromium over nickel. Master records are usually made this way. Only not as well.

Walt Disney hails Color TV as "One of the greatest of all innovations in entertainment!"

"It seems like yesterday (but it was a good forty years ago) that I first stepped into the entertainment world. Who ever dreamed then of the miracle of Color Television?

"In those days, we didn't even have color cartoons—just giving life to a static comic strip character was magic enough. And as for sound—well, we had the theater organist. Sometimes he even played the right tune at the right time.

"Now, we have high-fidelity sound and high-fidelity color, too. Combined on our home TV screens, Color TV adds up to one of the greatest of all innovations in entertainment.

"Color adds a fascinating new dimension to our home television programs. Color can stress the tension and suspense of an adventure story. Color adds so much to the enjoyment of famous classics. And color is, of course, a 'must' in stories where the songs and dances of people from other lands take a prominent role.

"Color, in other words, adds so much to so many fine programs that I'm happy we're part of it. Our TV series, 'The Wonderful World of Color,' is on NBC-TV, Sunday nights. I hope you've been watching it—in color, of course!"

Longest Run in Show Biz?—'Hamlet'; Many Performers Active Over 50 Yrs.

By SAM STARK

San Francisco.

The longest run in show business is "Hamlet." It had its first performance in New York at the Chapel St. Theatre (southwest corner of Nassau & Chapel St., later Beekman St.) on Nov. 26, 1761 with Lewis Hallam in the role. From 1797 to 1925 there was at least one production a year of "Hamlet" in New York City, to say nothing of the repertory and stock companies giving performances throughout U.S. and Canada.

"Hamlet" has been played behind a net (to protect the actors); without scenery; in modern dress; on horseback by equestrian teams; and with females playing the title role.

In 1864 at the Winter Garden, Edwin Booth played "Hamlet" for 100 consecutive nights, a record for those days that was not equaled until John Barrymore's 101 performances at the Sam H. Harris Theatre commencing Nov. 16, 1922.

In 1809, there was a boy "Hamlet," by name John Howard Payne (1792-1852), who was also the first American-born actor to undertake the role. Payne is best known, however, as the composer of "Home Sweet Home."

The greatest "Hamlet" was James E. Murdoch (1812-1893) with Edward L. Davenport (1815-1877) second and Edwin Booth (1833-1893) third. Edwin Forrest (1806-

Pain's Gone From Those Sunday-In-Philly Jokes But the Quips Linger On

By ABE S. ROSEN

(Deputy City Representative)

Philadelphia.

At precisely 1 p.m. on Sunday, June 18, 1961, the ancient vaudevillian gag: "I was in Philadelphia on Sunday and it was closed," was placed in its final resting place. For it was on that date that Pennsylvania's modified Blue Laws went into effect, permitting hotels in Philadelphia to serve liquor between the hours of 1 to 10 p.m.

Between the termination of Dry Sunday and a persistent campaign against comedians' use of the old epithets about Philadelphia, a once unproud era in the history of the City of Brotherly Love came to an end—we hope!

As most historians know, Philadelphia had the unique reputation in the East, under the height of vaudeville, of being "closed on Sunday" because no legit, movie or sports events was permissible. In 1934, the first of a series of Blue Laws modifications permitted baseball and later included movies, other sports, etc. But Philly's position remained unaltered in the old comics' notebooks.

In 1952, a new tide swept into

Critics A La Carte

Paris.

Polish and Czech critics who attended a recent convention of the International Association of Drama Critics were astonished to learn that there seems to be no course in drama criticism at the Sorbonne or in other universities in France, England, the U.S., etc. In Communist countries, they explained, drama criticism is taught in universities and graduates of the courses are autonatically given jobs as critics on various papers or magazines.

"But what if there are no jobs available after one graduates?" a French critic asked. The Pole shrugged: "There are not always seats available on a train after one buys a ticket."

Berlin Niteries Up Against 'Wall' In Coin Shortage

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin.

Berlin's situation of a divided city has contributed to make Berliners more home-conscious; and besides, this city hasn't really benefited from the much cited W-German "Wirtschaftswunder" (economic miracle). There is still a notorious coin shortage among many Berliners.

It has been often said before and can be said again that the average Berliner is a rare specimen in his city's night spots. Latter are more frequented by foreigners, W-German tourists or businessmen or a certain type of local customers to whom we count the newly riches and such people who want to be seen. Normally, a regular Berlin night-clubber must be very well heeled. The average Berliner is more fond of private parties and if he goes out, he prefers more the intimate places. His home usually has a tv set and is mostly well furnished. Living

SHOW BIZ IN SICK YEAR 1961

By ABEL GREEN

Amusements, which always persevere no matter the conditions, were possibly more markedly cerebral and nervous in 1961. The Twist perhaps was one answer to tension. Mort Sahl, Shelley Berman, Bob Newhart, et al., built a defense of wit against the sick, sick, sick world of Russian bombs, the Berlin fence of shame, the nightmare recall in the Eichmann testimony. Add, too, that 1961 was the year of the "adult" films which many adults didn't want and against which they sought to construct new censorships.

The very slogans and symbols were grim—"troika," fallout shelters, megatons, Castro, skyjackings, freedom riders, "better Red than dead." But against that, entertainment scored with many a boff film, many a smash play, many a big-selling disk, and plenty of television action despite the anvil chorus in the wasteland.

To paraphrase John Cameron Swayze, what kind of a show biz year had 1961 been? Never a dull moment. Headliners and newsmakers, from politics to sports, have had their reflexes on the passing show of life.

Whether it was Chubby Checker and The Twist, Jack & Jackie, schoolroom payola, Dick Gregory, MM (Maris & Mantle, not Monroe),

Memo from an expatriate on his 10th anniversary abroad:

When we shuttered the New York flackery to board a freighter for the Mediterranean, "they" all said:

"You can't just run away from it all."

The answer is: Yes, you can.

"You'll be dead in a year."

Answer: Or maybe you'll slowly come alive again.

Of the Kennedys (Joe and Jack), Prof. Baker, Benchley & Sherwood

By NEAL O'HARA

Boston.

This is a report from one who has read virtually every copy of VARIETY since 1910, when I was at a tender age and going to high school on Cape Cod, Mass., not far from Hyannis Port where President Kennedy maintains one of his temporary White Houses. (This was before touch football had been invented). I met our now President for the first time in the spring of 1937 when his grandfather, Honey Fitz (John F. Fitzgerald) phoned me at my suburban Boston home as follows:

Neal O'Hara

"Now look, Neal, my young grandson—you know, he's Joe's boy—is chairman of the Harvard freshman beer night committee and he wants to make it a hell of a success. So you've got to go out there and give some of your humor. I know you'll do it for me." I informed my good friend, Boston's former mayor, that I could perhaps enchant the Harvard freshmen (one of whom I had myself) for only eight or 10 minutes. "Oh, hell," Honey Fitz informed

Mass Prod. 'Culture'

Moscow.

The Western world frequently is astonished at the constant parade of first-rate pianists, violinists, et al, stemming from this hunk of the "cultural world." The reason is not hard to find. There are approximately 500 schools in the U.S.S.R. for beginners (in music) and anyone with the slightest inclination to study music is immediately enrolled, at government expense, and given a chance.

Courses are long and carefully planned, with an eye to push ahead every student who shows signs of talent.

Put Heat On 'Ice' As Means to Aid Legit's Economy

By MORRIS L. ERNST

The theatre was man's first means of mass communication. Ideas were conveyed by actors to then-very-illiterate people though much of the population of our planet is still illiterate and a high proportion of people exist without a written language. So no wonder that the theatre was historically subjected to precensorship, as is still the case in England under the kindly blue pencil of the Lord Chamberlain.

In our own history we did not stoop to precensorship and hence have seen the theatre grow with a freedom second only to that of

No Hotel Improvement, France's Glamor Off

Paris.

It is estimated that American tourism in Paris, and all over France, fell off about 15% in 1961. Political tensions, Algerian and other terrorist activities, and the lure of more lately discovered exotic climes for Yanks are considered responsible. However France reached its $300,000,000 foreign traveler income via growing influxes from Italy, West Germany and Belgium.

President J. F. Kennedy's plea for cutting down the excessive currency flow out of U.S. may also have had something to do with it. But many hardheaded French travel people feel an influence is (a) antiquated French hotel system and (b) general French flippancy towards visitors may have reacted over the years to begin to put a dent in American stopovers in France.

Sir Michael Redgrave's Actress-Daughter Urges More Show Biz Politics

By VANESSA REDGRAVE

London.

Many people, in and outside show business, say that "artists," whether singers, actors, entertainers, poets or painters, should not get mixed up in politics. They argue that if Beethoven had involved himself in the Napoleonic wars (he was a great admirer of Napoleon for a time) he would never have written a large number of his greatest compositions. Well, perhaps he wouldn't have, perhaps he would. But we no longer live in a world where a man or woman can cut themselves off from the troubles and problems of their fellow-men.

A kind of myth has been maintained, gladly by the public and by the artists themselves, that an entertainer is a sort of rare orchid. An actor is expected to reveal the emotions of his fellow-men and transitorily experience these for a few hours. "And all for nothing! For Hecuba!"

In wartime actors are conscripted into the Forces; we are expected to vote, and know exactly

Why And How Recorded Junk Music Doesn't Truly Reflect U.S. Tastes

By BILL RANDLE

Cleveland.

The recent Federal Communications Commission orientation under Newton Minow and the implied criticisms of National Assn. of Broadcasters prexy, LeRoy Collins, has created a series of shock waves throughout the radio industry, with as yet unseen ramifications. There is now strong basis to assume that contemporary radio, while outwardly trumpeting its claims of economic well-being, stability and community contribution, is inwardly going through one of the most confusing and potentially turbulent periods in its history, beset on all sides by competitive problems, intra-trade hassles, the threat of imminent Government action on specific license renewal requirements, and a general public relations problem involving "junk music," "top 40" formats, over-commercialization, and the hangovers of the highly publicized payola investigations.

Radio is, of course, many things to many different people. But a large number of radio stations today are involved in the grinding out of a rigidly limited list of mediocre, currently popular songs, tightly interspersed with insistent and incessant commercials, superimposed on a blur of monomaniacal jingles, contests, weather reports, capsule news, meaningless salutes and gimmicks, and a hodgepodge of "public service" announcements.

How did radio get that way? Historically, the early experimental period of the Twenties rapidly developed into the era of complex networks dominating the industry with nationally originated programs and strategically located high-power stations.

Following World War II, with the advent of television and its tremendous impact on the radio industry, a radical change took place. While network radio slowly declined, independent stations gained power and influence. With a need for low-cost operation, an already available format of music and news became the new standard, and a new local star emerged in the disk jockey, the salesman-entertainer whose prototype was New York's Martin Block. Big name performers emerged in every city, with Ed McKenzie, Detroit's "Jack the Bellboy," probably the outstanding example of the new type local radio personality.

Personality Trend

The personality disk jockey trend rapidly accelerated in the late 1940s and early 1950s until there were dozens of well-paid performers in the field, many earning from $50,000-$250,000 a year. In almost all areas the dominant factor in successful local radio stations was the talent, imagination, personality, salesmanship, technical skill and charisma of disk jockey performers. Single performers in

JFK Intent On Cultural Pitch

By LES CARPENTER

Washington.

President John F. Kennedy, a booster of the performing arts who hit the top, wants to make the White House a showplace of American culture and Washington a national centre of it.

The President and his wife may well take a significant place in show biz history. Their interest in each of the performing arts is lifelong and sincere. Their desire to use their present places of high rank to advance interest in the arts is their own idea, and they are pursuing it in their own way.

During the first year the Kennedys have spent in the White House, they have used imagination and taste to vary the entertainment offered to their guests. For many years, a singer or musician who happened to be in the Washington area at the time and had a free evening was brought into the White House to perform

SHOW BIZ: JFK PLUS ONE

The passing show of life, year after year, gives accent anew to the Shakespearean adage. Excepting that now the world can be staged in one's home if occasion warrants, "Runaway" Hollywood film productions are as nothing compared to the mobility of politicos and publicans, sages and savants, who are "produced" at instant notice for all to see, appraise and evaluate, accept or reject.

JFK's cultural accent coupled with Minow's "wasteland" barbs have sharpened the focus on global events. While all of it may not be entertainment, in the mass acceptance orbit, some class values have been given prime time, both in the White House and on the airwaves. Television has made vox pop as hip to pundits as to pratfalls.

From Ed Sullivan's bylined story in this issue, repriseing how the world's variety entertainment has contributed over the past 13 years to his "r-r-really big 'shew'", to the annual VARIETY lead-story on the year's show biz highlights, it is increasingly evident, that the crossroads of the world converge on the telecamera.

In turn, when there is global reason for utilizing authentic backgrounds for Hollywood production (and that goes for the French, British, German, Italian, Japanese and other filmmakers as well), they don't do a Mahomet—they go to the terrain for natural sets. If Hollywood has suffered because "runaway" production raises the spectre of a possible "ghost-town" for the film capital, that has its roots in something else. It is the inflated U.S. economy and the American tax structure versus the foreign subsidies, among other things.

There is no gainsaying one thing—these tenuous and troubled times make Show Business a necessity, not a luxury.

For itself, VARIETY will continue reporting, assessing and appraising show business with the same dispassionate objectivity as it has for the past 56 years. It is to be hoped that the immediate years ahead will mark a new milestone free from megatons and fallout shelters and global tensions, and that the rest of the 20th century will avail itself of less inhibited and more carefree entertainment. This will truly—and more sincerely—bring the peoples of the world together than the politically-loaded "cultural exchanges."

'Golden Age' Of Opera Roasted By Critics Then

By RICHARD TUCKER

Today's operatic art, it seems to me, must match very satisfactorily what was accomplished earlier in the century. To back up my theory, I recently read up in the N. Y. Public Library's Music Division on old reviews from those operatic days of yore.

Richard Tucker

New York's musical press was keen and uncompromising in the 20s (when the Golden Age was supposedly rounding out its years of glory) and I checked the New York Sun's redoubtable William J. Henderson for evidence concerning what was happening at 39th St. & Broadway. Random quotes from Henderson's pen read like an indictment of some of the period's greatest opera stars. Gigli was called "a very matter-of-fact tenor indeed" for his "unpoetical" characterizations; Chaliapin was lambasted as "a mediocre singer so far as the technics of the art are concerned — throughout no small portion of every opera he is talking instead of singing." Rosa Ponselle was once told she "did not know how to produce her upper tones . . . her art is naive, unfinished, uncertain in purpose" while Galli-Curci "sings out of tune pretty often and her tone is often very shaky."

Even Enrico Caruso, back at the time of his Met debut in 1903, came in for his share of journalistic sharpshooting from the New York Tribune's Henry Krehbiel, who underscored his "tiresome Italian vocal affectations" in "Rigoletto." The Times' Richard Aldrich found "deplorable lack of characterization" in Caruso's acting with Emma Eames in "Tosca," noted in a review of "Les Huguenots" that "he

IMAGINATION BEATS MONEY

Competition & 'Runaway' as Twins In Hollywood, Once a 'Company Town'

By THOMAS M. PRYOR

Hollywood.

Jack Dales of the Screen Actors Guild has sought "unemotional" discussion of the production "runaway" problem. Such a conference would embrace management, talent guilds, the unions and the agents. It might well be more productive in the long run than any Congressional "investigation."

There are many factors involved which require expert and reasoned knowledge of political, economic and artistic considerations, not to overlook a complex assortment of purely personal interests.

How many more pictures can Hollywood, once the world's leading production center, afford to lose?

The answer to that question concerns every man and woman who makes his or her living in the Coast studios—and it concerns their children as well. Indeed, the employment level at motion picture and television film studios concerns to a considerable degree the economy of the whole Los Angeles community.

Ironically, the future of the Screen Actors Guild's own hardwon pension plan is threatened by the foreign filming buildup. And the more pictures that are produced outside the country, the more insecure the pension will become. SAG has influence. It has earned the respect of management over the years because it has generally used its power judiciously. However rightly or wrongly, there is a strong feeling, even among many of its own members, that SAG has not done all it might have done up to now to help put a damper on "runaway" production.

Whenever the queston is raised, "who's responsible for runaway production?" the answer inevitably is "the stars."

There is considerable truth in this, for it is common knowledge that the destiny of the American film business rests today as it never has before in the hands of less than two dozen top actors and actresses. Not all of them want to work abroad. Several have declined o'seas offers. The point is that those who no longer will work in Hollywood have been sufficient to upset the whole works.

Reasons why stars desire to work abroad are numerous and they do not always involve artistic considerations. Opportunity to make a savings in personal income taxes is an important factor. Equally attractive is the chance to live high on the hog for months on end with living costs being absorbed in the production budget.

Production Follows Stars; Biggest Fact of 'Runaway'

Stars, however, are not the only ones to be thus lured abroad. This applies as well to certain producers and director. But it has become pretty much a fact of life in Hollywood that stars are leading the industry today and that pictures will go wherever the stars desire to go.

Hollywood's ability to "recreate the world" on a studio stage or backlot has been one of its strongest assets. George Stevens expertly interwove backgrounds of Holland with studio built sets for "The Diary of Anne Frank," and as a current example of mixing the real with the studio recreation there is Stanley Kramer's latest, "Judgment at Nuremberg."

Many people, including a number of high placed executives, are frankly worried about the future of Hollywood as they look upon idle stages here while their so-called independent producer groups keep stages going in Europe.

From the point of national interest, a strong Hollywood is important. Hollywood's pix have been recognized as ambassadors not only for democratic ideals, but for the general commerce of this country's varied industries, from bathtubs to refrigerators. True, our pictures have not always transported the best "image" of the U. S., but that does not in any way minimize their importance to the nation at large. In fact, the importance of entertainment films to this country was emphasized anew in the recent plea made by Edward R. Murrow, United States Information Agency director, to present a more uplifting image.

Thus "runaway" production involves a lot more than simply running away from Hollywood.

Problem Just 'Talked About'; Now Its Acute Angles Show

Emphasis must be upon the long neglect. The "runaway" production problem has been growing under the noses of management, talent guilds and unions for almost a decade. On several occasions the AFL Film Council has issued protests, and at one time there had been some talk about a possible boycott by projectionists of "runaway" pix.

Richard F. Walsh, prexy of the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees, discussed the situation, at least on one occasion, with studio heads. Walsh upon examining the facts recognized that there is justification for making some pictures abroad. There appears to be no argument against going anywhere in the world that artistic requirements demand.

Indeed, there is no denying either that it is most desirable—even necessary—from the standpoint of international trade relations to reinvest abroad through production activities some percentage of the revenues earned by Hollywood pictures in foreign countries. International trade is a two-way street, as has been said more than once by Eric Johnston, president of the Motion Picture Assn. of America, and without the foreign boxoffice Hollywood might not survive.

Much loose talk accusations of income tax dodging ignores truth that studios and independent producers have played perhaps even a more important role in shunting production abroad in order to take advantage of financial subsidies offered by foreign governments.

This last temptation, according to several sources, will increase, if anything, with the entry of Britain into the European Common Market and the prospect of obtaining government subsidy benefits through co-production deals involving Britain, France, Italy and West Germany on a single picture. How, people are asking, could Hollywood compete cost-wise against that kind of a setup?

Meanwhile, the production slowdown in Hollywood is being accented as the result of another comparatively new development. This is the financing, wholly or in part, by American companies of foreign producers to make films which qualify for various forms of assistance by foreign countries. As the head of one guild put it, "this is the most insidious form of runaway from Hollywood."

High labor costs in Hollywood—starting with the stars and going down the line of production workers—are said by some to be responsible for driving filming out of town. More than one producer has said:

"You have a 35 to one chance to win at roulette. In Hollywood the

NO MAGIC LURKS IN BANKROLL

By JERRY WALD

Hollywood.

Certain—and too many—modern film showmen have decided that "special" means BIG. Money has been equated with excellence, for it is much easier to spend money than to think creatively. Too many producers, directors, writers and stars seem to feel that if enough money is spent on a film, and this expenditure is highly publicized, the public will go out of curiosity to see how the money was used, if for no other reason.

Isn't it about time we learned that elaborate sets and costumes cannot be substituted for the intent and content of films?

This fact is currently being hit home with a vengeance by the immense international success of European films. Those hitting the headlines, and getting talked about, as well as seen, have been produced with a new, fresh and realistic outlook. The success of these films should be disturbing, and stimulating, to us in Hollywood. How have these films, which cost "peanuts" to make by Hollywood standards, become hits? What do they contain that we haven't been putting into our films?

At the crossroads of the present, we must look at these films and learn from them the valuable lesson which lies at the base of their success; that they substitute imagination for money. The answer is as simple, and complex, as that. They don't make the error of substituting money for mood; happy endings for truth; vulgarity for sensitivity, and hugeness for beauty.

In plain language, they don't "play down" to an "ignorant" public. Like all creative artists . . . novelists, playwrights, musicians or sculptors — European filmmakers have something to say and say it in an honest and uncompromising a fashion as they can, displaying a respect for the intelligence of the public — and the public responds to this and has shown real appreciation for what they are doing.

Hollywood and glamour have always been synonymous. In the dictionary glamour is defined as "a delusive fascination"; in other words, glamour is illusionary and artificial. In trying to stick to the old concept of "giving the public what it wants," by putting on the screen a phoney, make-believe, illusorily idealistic world, Hollywood has failed to grow with its audience. The best efforts of the best minds seem to be devoted to putting last year's crop of hits in new packages and to try constantly to duplicate last year's hits, instead of striking out in new, untrammeled directions.

Too many of us in Hollywood have failed to recognize that today's audiences are ahead of us in their concept of what they want in entertainment. The success of a number of overseas films proves this. Each is strikingly original, fresh and imaginative; each varies in theme and content. Their only common denominator is originality and imagination.

This is perhaps confusing to many of us who are accustomed to thinking in stereotypes and are forever latching on to a bandwagon somebody else started, or is driving. Just as there is no room for look-alikes among personalities on the screen, so it is with motion pictures. Each must have a uniqueness, an individuality which is in a large measure responsible for its success, The same applies to stars, otherwise they would be lost among the thousands of hopefuls who annually make their bids for stardom.

Personally, we feel Hollywood has regarded itself as a factory for too long. Even a "dream factory," as a prominant sociologist once referred to Hollywood, cannot survive without depth of imagination and honesty. The manufacture of dreams is a far more precarious

What to Do With the Lively Arts? Leave 'Em Alone, Lick 'Em, or Lead 'Em

By JOHN E. FITZGERALD

(The author writes on cinema for The Critic and was recipient of the Directors Guild of America "Best Critic" Award for his weekly column in Our Sunday Visitor.)

Hollywood.

I suppose that when it comes right down to the problem of the arts in a democracy, there are really only three things you can do about them. (1) Wipe 'em out, (2) leave 'em alone or (3) regulate them. All have been tried at one time or another.

Wipe 'em out? Plato, for one, wouldn't have them around in his ideal state. He was suspicious that the artists might upset the applecart and disturb the peace. And, both before and after his day, politicians have been wary of the arts—for they might be seditious. Moralists, too, have been wary of them—for they might be suggestive. Patriotic groups have the same feelings—for they might be subversive. Educators and members of society have also been wary—the arts might be salacious, seductive or worse.

And, throughout history, many have moved to wipe 'em out completely.

Leave 'em alone? That's a possibility too. Right now two schools are working busily: one to throw up a fence before it becomes illegal to do so (those who want governmental censorship); and the others to tear down all fences and make it legally impossible for them to be rebuilt (those who don't want censorship).

Somehow, for some reason, some feel that the death of censorship will mean the resurrection of the boxoffice and a renaissance of art. Yet, were censorship removed tomorrow, it's a safe bet that few ushers would be crushed by cheering crowds pouring into the theatres.

The industry as a whole persists in sending out battle cries to unite and fight censorship rather than taking the trouble to find out why audiences are crying for it or channeling industry energy into making better films in such skilled good taste that practically nobody would protest.

Before we get to the third alternative — namely regulating the arts, let's pause a second and see what's the big problem anyway. Why should we work hard to stifle the arts or to remove all restrictions on them or to place some restrictions on them? What's so important about the rats in our society? Maybe it's because most of us feel that the arts can influence us.

Regulate 'em? Motion pictures, for example, get a lot of this care. Recently the Motion Picture Assn. of America took a censorship survey. They checked some 63 countries. Only three of these (Japan, West Germany and Nicaragua) had intra-industry self-regulation similar to the USA's Production Code. In the other 60 countries the censorship systems were government-operated; and all but a half-dozen of these were on a national basis. The others functioned on a provincial or municipal level (and in certain cases local censorship supplemented national censorship).

Censors in 43 countries can classify films in such a way as to limit their showings to certain age groups. And in all instances but two, the censors can prohibit a film from being shown or require that cuts be made.

What's the answer to the question: How to Be a Censor? To coin a phrase "the best censorship is self-censorship."

If those who produce, present and patronize entertainment would adopt a little more self-regulation and a little less serious indignation maybe we could eventually eliminate boards of unqualified, untrained, uninformed, and uninterested political appointees who operate according to purely personal and subjective standards of what is permissable or not.

Maybe we're not looking at the whole problem or looking deep enough.

If you produce entertainment . . . why not consider being more an artist and less a businessman? Few really fine films flop. Too many consider their work as being product, starting to call it art only when the law intervenes and they plead that it is protected under amendments that equate it with journalism. Shock is no substitute for skill. Take care of the art and the morals will take care of themselves.

If you present entertainment . . . why not consider more carefully what you choose to show. You're not merely a popcorn merchant but a dispenser of ideas and images that can perhaps help or hurt the fellow members of your community. A theatreman and the theatre he runs soon get a reputation. What's yours? "He gave the public what it wanted" is a fitting epitaph only for pushers and pimps. Theatregoers will never understand why they see offensive previews at kiddie shows or have adult and family films shown on the same double feature.

If you patronize entertainment . . . why not consider more carefully what you're going to buy or let your children buy. Know what's playing, what the reputable critics think of its values, where it's playing and with whom your children are attending it.

Honolulu.

Certain indications to the contrary, Honolulu's newsmen do like Hollywood celebrities. It's only the infrequent clash of temperament between interviewer and interviewee that has sparked rumors that Alohaland's reporters are as merciless as London's perspicacious, possibly pernicious, pressmen in their treatment of visiting film stars.

Heaven, to coin an expression, hath no fury like a newsman scorned. If a reporter gets the go-away-don't-bother-me treatment, especially as an ulcerous deadline nears, a little pique is apt to creep into the copy. But there's no prejudice against Hollywood per se. Visiting diplomats, generals, governors, and such characters are equally vulnerable targets for a "you-can't-do-that-to-me" newsman.

A prime example of all-but-declared war involved, of all people, the unlikely Groucho Marx a few months back. Just as the comic was sitting down to breakfast in the dining room of an arriving ship, a reporter who had just boarded offport via tugboat barged in on the surprised Marx. According to Groucho, who was soured throughout his entire stay by the article that followed, the reporter ordered him "Say Something Funny!" Groucho ad libbed in earnest that he's never funny until after he's had his orange juice. ("If you don't believe that's true, just ask my wife," he told this scribe a day or so later.) The reporter came up with an article that quoted ship personnel and passengers as saying the name Groucho should have a "y" instead of an "o" as the last letter. And so on.

Groucho was smarting from the typewriter-ribbon-in-the-back treatment when he and this writer were brought together on neutral ground by producer Irwin Allen, who had been with Groucho on the breakfast-table battleground. Groucho allowed it was a lousy way to treat anybody and that Hawaii's tourist

Humorist Waxes Wroth Over Wraithful Authors (Ghost Byliners) in His Latest Omnibus, 'How To Write Without Knowing Nothing' (Little, Brown)

By H. ALLEN SMITH

Back in the pre-Jurassic period when I was a young man playing me a waiting game), I had an assortment of ridiculous ambitions. The wildest of these was the yearning to become the author of a book. I knew it was impossible, but I put my shoulder to the wheel (invented during the preceding year) and worked for two decades and finally made it.

My first two books were quite modest in their scope and less than that in their acceptance by the public, but they were books and they had my name on their covers. By the time I had written them I already knew that the only way to learn to write is to write, and then write some more, and keep on writing with a steadfast fury year after year after year. And to spend an hour or two every day studying—reading classics and biographies and histories, because history properly written covers the whole scope of human life, including human folly, in which I am a devout believer.

I am congenitally slothful, and I've always been inclined to steady merrymaking, so it was a rough job for me to do all this. Still, I did it. I kept on writing in my spare time and finally turned out a book that attracted a lot of attention, and leaped to the top of the bestseller lists, and even brought me soul-stirring compliments from such heroic characters as Damon Runyon and H. L. Mencken and Gene Fowler.

In the days when I first took down with cacoethes scribendi—the irresistible itch to write—the people who were turning out successful books were, of all things, writers. They were pros. The aforementioned H. L. Mencken, and Sinclair Lewis, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, H. G. Wells, Booth Tarkington, Somerset Maugham—these were the glittering stars who dominated the bestseller lists, along with people like Zane Grey and Mary Roberts Rinehart and Rex Beach and Harold Bell Wright and Kathleen Norris. All professional writers, no matter how great or how small their talent.

Then the non-writers began to take over the business of writing. Henry Ford didn't write his autobiography, "My Life and Work," which he wrote in 1922. Trader Horn wrote his bestselling book in 1927, and it was written by Ethelreda Lewis. Lindbergh turned out "We" the same year without touching a pencil. A fine upstanding American character named Gaston Means wrote a scandalous book in 1930, although he didn't write it. From then on things began to snowball. Influential men and women in various prominent callings got out of bed in the morning, yawned, scratched their navels, and said, "Say, I wonder how it would be to be a writer. Think I'd like it. Guess I'll try it." So they shopped around and found a real writer in need of rent and gin money and they secretly hired that writer to write them a book. After a while the tiniest bit of demi-integrity got into the game, and the "as-told-to" books began rolling off the presses. There are plenty of them today, but there are also plenty of books by non-writers whose publishers put forward strong claims that they were actually written, sentence after sentence, by the celebrity. The louder they make those claims, the more positive it becomes that a professional writer had a hand in production of the book. One movie actor's autobiography, recently a bestseller, was issued with such a claim, iterated and reiterated. He actually wrote it, cried the publisher. With his own hot little hands. Every last word of it. They kept yelling and kept yelling and then somebody quietly did a bit of investigation and found out that the actor's own hot little hands were in his pants pockets, or around assorted broads. The book was written by a talented hack.

Unholy Alliance

I remember a few years back when a minor-league lady author sued a leading comedian, charging that he engaged her to write a novel under his name so he could acquire a reputation as a literary man. The judge threw the case out, saying that the transaction between author and comedian was not actionable because, basically, it was a fraud on the public. Just recently this same comedian's name appeared as coauthor of a novel. He and all of his show biz friends, who are legion, appeared on dozens of television and radio shows boosting his book, rarely ever mentioning the professional writer who was his "collaborator" and who, I'm bound to believe, really did the writing.

I know about another top actor-comedian who, some years back, became the author of a bestseller. His book was written in the publisher's office with very little contact between principal and ghost, and then was submitted to the comedian for approval. His verdict was: "My God, what a swell book I've written!" I used to be friendly with a wealthy show business personality who one day decided that he wanted to be a writer. He went out and hired a whole stable of boys, capable but hungry writers, and put them to work, and before long my friend was being quoted wide and far as a great wit and humorist. This gave me a slow burn, which in time became a fast burn, and one day I said to him, "You may not realize it, but you are taking dollars out of my pocket. I have a humor book in the stores and you have a humor book in the stores, but you are a wealthy man and you are laying out large sums of your own money to boost the advertising budget on your book. Why the hell can't you be satisfied with being what you are? Why do you have to buy yourself a reputation as an author? He asked me to leave his baronial premises and our relations came to an end.

I may, at last, be approaching the point of this whole discussion. I have spent something like 35 years trying to learn to be a competent writer. Some people believe I have achieved my aim. Yet today I find myself, along with many other writers whose careers match my own, being pushed off the bestseller lists by a lot of writers who are not writers. Any comic who enjoys public favor automatically writes a book which he is incapable of writing. These boys are horrible hams, but they are also skilled practitioners of the hard sell. They race from one tv show to the next, thrusting a copy of their fraudulent book into the eye of the camera. One publisher admitted recently that the jackets of his books are now designed with eye-catching type, the better to be seen when rammed down the public's throat on television shows. And I actually heard one comedian, shoving his book forward, say on a tv show: "Folks, I want you to know that this is a real swell book. All my friends say so, and it is a bestseller like crazy, and you're bound to get a real charge out of it. So go out and buy a copy because you will never have so much fun in your life."

One night somebody on a television show asked Dody Goodman, the girl who undertakes the role of amiable idiot, if she had started writing a book yet. "No," she said. "They asked me to write a book but all the subjects have been used up."

Assorted Themes

There are up-from-degradation books, some by gutter-drunk actresses who have taken the veil, others by ex-hop-heads, whether they be boxers or radio announcers or mildewed beatniks. There are books by fat lady parasites living off the soft underbelly of big-ess Society whether in Washington or New York or Europe. There are books by rapists occupying death cells, and by junkies who play bop music, and by countless semiliterate politicians who draw upon the huge pool of ghost writers operating in Washington in order that they, the politicians, may become eloquent and graceful in their prose.

There are books by preachers who know the solutions to all human problems but who couldn't locate their collarbones with both hands, by guys who tell how they made $40,000,000 with one arm tied behind their backs, by drunken fliers and by lawyers whose ethics would offend the sensitive soul of Frank Costello, and by arrogant tennis players and by advertising executives seeking to establish some justification for their hum-buggery and by doctors who want the human race to cure its ills by dosing itself with a mixture of goat's milk and persimmon juice.

There are books galore by television personalities famous for their petulance or their insolence toward their guests, hence national heroes. There are books by celebrated keepers of bawdyhouses and by whiny crack-note singers not old enough to work up a sweat in the armpits. Please remember that when the former truckdriver, Elvis Presley, arrived home from service in the army, he was asked about his plans, and his first response, delivered in all seriousness, was: "I'm a-gonna write a book." He was inspired, no doubt, by the tremendous literary success of another singer in the seedtime of life, one Pat Boone, philosopher. Either that or by the fact that a successful book in recent years was written by Lassie, the dog. As told to a man named Rudd Weatherwax. Honest to God.

As I say, all of this has been somewhat depressing to me. Well, not exactly depressing. Infuriating. In a recent book for children a lady author included a chapter, "How to Write a Book." She said: "You can write a book about anything . . . If you can't write yet, you could just draw. Then the book could be for someone who can't read yet. Or you could write a book for someone who can read only one word."

I think it's coming to that. I used to believe that book publishers were people in a very special sort of business governed by a very special set of ethics. They held themselves aloof from the toils and stratagems and outright buccaneering of the business community. But today I suspect that some of them are interested in . . . well, in m-o-n-e-y. They will publish any book. A semiliterate tv performer submits a book to them and they give no thought to the quality of its contents—their interest is solely in the size of his audience and his willingness to plug himself blue in the face.

Such being the case, it is understandable why more and more non-writers are busy writing into tapercorders. I am continually astounded at the calibre of people I meet who think they can write. They are multitude and it never occurs to them that a certain amount of training would be helpful as preliminary to a writing career.

In this connection I would like to digress for a moment. I have become convinced that I have the physical appearance and the conversational ability of John J. Kallikak. Perhaps a few cuts below him. Week after week I meet new people, some in the country, some in the city, and I note that they study me curiously, and later I find out that they have gone home and started writing. It is quite clear what inspired them. They looked at me and they said to themselves, "Well, if that funny-looking kook can make a living as a writer, then I ought to become a millionaire as a writer." They come back to me eventually, of course, with their grubby out-of-kilter manuscripts, singlespaced and smudged and aswarm with misspellings and grammatical atrocities, and they offer me a percentage of the take if I'll dress the stuff up and get it published. I strangle them.

All of this leads me to say that I believe, logical or not, that if a man is incapable of writing a book, he should not be permitted to set himself up as a writer, to pass himself off as an author. There is such a thing as too much freedom of the press. I believe that, with a handful of exceptions, nobody ever said, out of a clear sky or even a cloudy one, "I guess I'll be a writer," and became one immediately.

What can I do about it?

Nothing.

Except, perhaps, I could inaugurate a whole new career—as a drug addict. I hear it makes you feel good.

Runaway Or Progress?

By JOHN HUSTON

Vienna.

It's a very strange anomaly that in America, where the "right to work" is so vigorously defended, we should find factions in the film industry seriously involved in an effort to restrict that principle. For that reason, I cannot help but feel that he legislative approach to the problem of so-called "runaway production" is wrong. The growing swing to gobal production is not running away. Rather, it is a sign of progress. And you can't stop progress by legislation.

I'm against anybody who tries to force somebody into doing anything, a fact which has sometimes caused my viewpoints to be misunderstood.

If we believe in the Right to Work, then we should believe that anyone has the right to work any place in the world. We aren't being consistent if we insist that all Hollywood films must be made in Hollywood and only with Hollywood technicians. No one can convince me, for example, that it is either equitable or profitable for the industry to refuse permission to work in Hollywood to such a brilliant cameraman as Mexico's Gabriel Figueroa.

Every Hollywood-based picture, whether it's made in Hawaii or Hindustan, helps our motion picture industry. The dollars it produces help to replenish the Hollywood coffers so that other pictures can be made by Hollywood companies.

And every Hollywood-based picture made abroad provides jobs for Hollywood technicans, jobs which, in many cases, would not have been available to them otherwise.

I think my current picture, "Freud," might be cited as a case in point. During the four years it was in preparation, I know of three instances when European producers were prepared to make it if I abandoned the idea. But because Universal and I agreed that we should make it and that it would be a better picture if filmed on authentic locales, it was made in Austria and Germany. As a result, a considerable number of Hollywood technicians and three Hollywood stars were engaged in its production. If it had been abandoned, a European producer would have made it entirely with European talent.

Hollywood Technicians

As a matter of fact, I would not consider making a picture away from Hollywood without having a certain number of key men from Hollywood around me. Hollywood technical standards still are the highest in the world, but I have discovered that good men work extremely well together anywhere. While technicians of other countries learn much from Hollywood experts and their advanced know-how, the Hollywood technicians invariably learn something from their foreign co-workers too.

During the production of "Freud" our Hollywood actors and the English, French, German and Austrian members of the cast worked together without any signs of antagonism or jealousy. The German electricians had no trouble in lighting the sets quickly and efficiently for our English camera crew. Assistant director Ray Gosnell, from Hollywood, and Laci Von Ronay, our Austrian-German assistant, worked smoothly as a team. The various production departments at the Bavaria Studios in Munich and at the Rosenhugel Studios in Vienna provided us with everything needed—and without delay.

Figures on "runaway production" have a habit of refuting themselves. One set of statistics points out that employment is down. Another reveals that Hollywood production workers' payrolls are at an all-time high. As I write this I have before me a trade paper article which says: "Indicative that so-called runaway production and studio and other economies have not seriously affected payrolls to any visible extent is the fact that there hasn't been a month this year (1961) where salary payments dropped below the $20 million mark." I know from experience that when trying to secure Hollywood filmakers and technicians for a film unit abroad, good Hollywood men are very hard to find.

No matter how heavy a barrage of propaganda is loosed on "runaway production," three impoitant facts cannot be denied. First, filming will go wherever the big stars want to go. Secondly, it's impossible to refute the argument of the creative personnel that pictures should be made where the artistic requirements of the subjects can best be realized. And thirdly, major interest of the people who finance pictures is to go where the best value for the invested dollar is received.

In the first instance, I cannot speak for the personal desires of any star, neither can I support their attempts to evade the payment of American taxes. I am proud to be an American citizen and I pay my proper taxes to Uncle Sam in the usual way.

As a director and writer, I must support the artistic advantages of true-locale filming.

From the third standpoint, my loyalty to the industry I believe in so strongly leaves me no other choice but to support the men who make its existence possible.

While decrying the legislative approach to the problem, I heartily support the statement recently attributed to George Stevens in which he suggested that all people in the industry—individuals, guilds, unions and artists — should carefully consider the situation and try to figure out a way in which Hollywood can regain the initiative it once held in world-wide filmmaking.

A greater emphasis on the choice of American subjects for big pictures would certainly help. The greatest money-making picture of all time is "Gone With the Wind." An American story, it was made in America. Perhaps every studio might profitably set up an American story for one of its summit projects, such as MGM has done with "How the West Was Won."

Perhaps a greater flexibility is needed in the contracts between unions and producers, as has been said.

Perhaps, too, a clearer understanding of the problem on the part of Washington might help. I can't say, however, that I am in accord with the suggestion that the American Government grant subsidies to filmakers as a number of European companies are doing. Such subsides doubtless would invite artistic control, something that every creative artist abhors.

And perhaps my viewpoints only serve to substantiate the fact that I am what the late James Agee liked to call me—"a natural-born antiauthoritarian individualistic libertarian, without portfolio."

Hollywood Versus Other Places

Films Shot There in 1961, On U.S. Location, or Overseas

By WILLIAM ORNSTEIN

Hollywood.

Approximately 150 features were produced or in production in the U. S. in 1961 and about 90 films were made in foreign countries aided and abetted by American film enterprises. Both categories embrace major as well as indie operations. In latter group some loners are attached to fiscal major ties, others finding resources from other channels. In total, tallies sum up to a hefty 254 which, it will be pointed out, is as close to the end result as one can gather from official records.

How do these computations stand along side of 1960 and 1959?

For the two previous years, the Assn. of Motion Picture Producers, through PCA Code Administrator Geoffrey Shurlock's office, limned it this way:

| DOMESTIC | 1960 | 1959 |
|---|---|---|
| Produced and released by members | 29 | 31 |
| Produced by non-members and released by members | 85 | 97 |
| Produced and released by non-members | 6 | 22 |
| Totals | 120 | 150 |
| FOREIGN | | |
| Produced and released by members | 5 | 6 |
| Produced by non-members and released by members | 82 | 55 |
| Produced and released by non-members | 4 | 12 |
| Totals | 91 | 72 |
| Combined totals | 211 | 223 |

The report further noted that of the 91 shot abroad in 1960, 31 were by American companies, remaining 60 by foreign production organizations. It was also pointed out 222 scripts were submitted to PCA during 1960, 32 less than 1959. Reason: Prolonged writers' strike.

It should be mentioned that the Assn. of Motion Picture Producers and Production Code Office lack full data on films made in Hollywood or anywhere else during 1961. The same holds true for the AFL-CIO Film Council, International Alliance of Theatrical and Stage Employes, Screen Actors Guild, Directors Guild of America, Screen Producers Guild or any other union or guild in Hollywood.

Sizing up the three years, it would appear that 1961 was a healthy one for Hollywood pix. United Artists with its many associated producers and 20th-Fox with its affinity to Robert Lippert respectively came through with 27 and 24 pix in this country. Third largest domestic producer was Columbia with 16. Likewise, same company was the mostest with pix made outside of U.S. with 15.

Paramount took fourth spot in U.S. tallies at 15 with Metro in fifth place and Warner Bros. sixth. With the exception of American International, which scored next to Columbia on the foreign boards, Metro and United Artists evened accounts with 10 each. American, it should be pointed out, did not actively engage in producing or financing most of the non-American pix on its sked. The extent of company's participation was hazy in most instances, on checking. Pathe America financed nine in U.S., eight overseas. Warners accounted for five on the foreign side, which is almost half what was produced on the Burbank lot.

In the complete run-down of titles, producers, etc., some may never appear on screen. Changes continue to be made during production, sometimes even after canning when test engagements or other reasons prove a more solid b.o. seller is needed. It's happened time and again and 1961 was no exception. For the most part, however, the titles should hold up as the pix fan out to key situations.

There also may be some changes on indie outlets with majors. During past few months three different companies were mentioned for "Lolita." First it was 20th-Fox, then Warners and lately MGM. As another for instance, take three properties like "Chapman Report," "Greatest Story" and "Days of Wine and Roses." All started out on the 20th gestation grounds, first and last winding at WB. George Stevens and his "Greatest" now funneling through UA.

Each moved off the Westwood lot because of story trouble with 20th's board of directors. MGM had its headache with "Lady L" with $2,000,000 sunk into it. Although it was stated project will be revived this year, there's still a big question mark in certain quarters.

Restless to Move

At 20th particularly, producers like Jerry Wald and Henry T. Weinstein want to be more active, as are other men on the lot, but production head Peter G. Levathes just won't give them free wheeling. He's set his sights on 15 big ones for 1962 and he's ladling out one here, another there for greater representation for all than concentration by a few.

Other lots and front offices have had their problems in the same direction. And, in all instances, it's "Wall St." that's responsible for tightening the fiscal ropes. Hence many producers impatiently wait a change in lights.

The important stars—and some count up to 15—who are in great demand are blamed for holding up any number of productions. Availability is one of the most powerful words in Hollywood today. Everything hinges on it. You can get all the studio space you want, but not the stars or important players, all of whom have more work than ever, most preferring to take it easier than they have, while producers wrangle with their agents with little or no success.

That's been one of the big problems in 1961: Availability of stars and important players. Then there's the writers situation. The rewriting that goes on before a script finally sees words being acted has become more and more pronounced. Luckily Screen Writers Guild takes care of the final credits because in some cases the list of scribblers has almost amounted to a baseball team, and acting that way.

It was also noted during past year that more preparatory work has gone into pix than ever before in concerted efforts to cut down production costs. In some cases it worked, others it was wasted energy. Yet, despite this and other measures taken to whittle expenses, a great deal of preliminary and post filming goes on day after day at the studios after pix are reported fini.

Crews: $5,000 a Day

This is probably done because of expense of technical crews. In some instances crews cost $5,000 a day. Today, unit managers have the daily cost down to a science before a pic gets moving before cameras. And $5,000 a day for a major studio is cheap, they say.

Some studios classified a film that started in November and lapped into the new year as a 1960 pic. The same will hold true with a number of pix destined for stages toward the end of the current year. With these factors more or less balancing themselves, the numbers cited for various companies, both in U.S. and abroad, will hold up in the final analysis.

It should be pointed out six features were made, or started, in New York City, per "Miracle Worker," "Requiem for a Heavyweight," "The Hustler," "Hey, the Twist," "Young Doctors" and "Long Day's Journey Into the Night." These are included in the accompanying charts.

However, what has not been included in this Report from Hollywood are several projected cartoon features. Since UPA has spent more than six months on "Gay Purr-ee," it has been added to the Warner count. For a while it appeared UA would handle it internationally, but the deal between cartooncry head Henry Saperstein and the Mirisch boys fell through, even after it had been announced by freres from Milwaukee.

Not included are "Yogi Bear" feature in works by Hanna-Barbara, a Jack Kinney story, 2/3 animation, rest live, on the U.S. Constitution, and finished script by Dave Dietege awaiting financing. These plus several other cartoon head men have talked about may be included this year. At this point there's no telling who will make what and what will make who. Walt Disney, for some time, has had "Sword and the Stone" in work and it most likely will come out as a 1962 release. Again, it all depends.

UPA prexy Saperstein stated when making his deal with Jack Warner for "Gay Purr-ee," latter wanted him to start at once on a second feature, but it was no dice. One at a time, said Saperstein. Meanwhile, when he gets through with "G.P." his company has to get busy on an hour cartoon for a network.

It seems the cartoon factories were enjoying their best year during 1961, from all accounts. Telefilm plants didn't do too bad, either. Now, if . . . that's a big two letter word that's on the tongues of everybody that has anything to do with production in this part of the world . . . and it has an important echo in distribution and exhibition quarters all over the world. As for production budgets, who believe them? Those given out for publication, that is.

¶ A Fantasy of Ye Olde Censorship Weighing The Morality of a Writer Named Shakespeare

By ERIC JOHNSTON
(President, Motion Picture Assn. of America)

Washington.

In the year 1606, shortly after the reign of Elizabeth I, a law was passed in England. It was called the Act to Restrain Abuses of Players. It was censorship — 17th century style.

Eric Johnston

Scant information is in existence on how this Act worked—with one exception. A perseve r i n g British archivist recently unearthed a detailed account of a meeting of these merrie old censors in 1610. I now possess the original parchment of this report. And I've had it freely translated from the Middle English, because I think it tells us something. Perchance, the winter of our discontent began in the snows of yesteryear. In other words, times change, censors don't.

The meeting took place in the Office of the Master of Revels. The censor group numbered four persons: the Master or full-time staff director; Lady Upright-Chaste, an Elizabethan do-gooder; Lord Pure, a stage-struck Earl; and Mistress Clean, a good dame from Shoreditch who represented the kingdom's common folk.

All had volunteered to serve on the censoring body. One had even begged.

The purpose of the meeting was to classify the works of a widely-acclaimed playwright of the day. For there had been much clamoring in the kingdom of late. Some said the goings-on at the Globe had given rise to delinquency among the children and the serfs. Others said the Globe was a breeding ground for witchcraft. And others wailed that everybody was watching plays, and nobody was reading books anymore. Only a few felt that the evil influence came from the Italian and French plays being presented at the art amphitheaters near the Globe.

At any rate, "classification" was to rid England of all these ills.

Now, none of the censors had seen the plays they were about to classify. This, naturally, was a prerequisite for service on any local censoring group. Here's the way it went:

The Master of Revels opened the meeting with the explanation that an "A" rating meant "suitable for vassals and lackeys;" "B" was "nobility only;" and "X" signified "no public performance" or "stag night at the castle."

He picked up a copy of the first play to be classified and read the title aloud: "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

X Marks The Dirt

Mistress Clean at once gasped: "That sounds like a dirty play to us commoners!" All agreed with her, and the play was given an "X" rating without further discussion. Lady Upright-Chaste then asked for some information on the playwright. The Master replied that little was known about him, but that "all his plays are sick and decadent." If that was the case, Lord Pure ventured, the playwright must be from the south of England. Hearing this, Lady Upright-Chaste wanted to know if he had written "Bat on a Hot Stone Perapet" or "A Stratford Named Desire." The Master replied in the negative.

Next came a play entitled "Romeo and Juliet." The Master gave a brief description of the story line. "That'll give the kids some ideas, for sure!" bellowed Mistress Clean.

Lord Pure then stated that this kind of story was fairly acceptable on the continent, but he felt it could not be permitted in England where the concepts of morality were so different.

Mistress Clean muttered something about "them foreigners," and the play was given an "X" rating.

A Violent 'Caesar'

A play called "Julius Ceasar" followed. After the Master's synopsis, Lady Upright-Chaste commented: "Definitely, too much violence." And the others agreed heartily.

But the Master broke in: "Now look folks, we can't give them all an 'X'. If I get him to drop the stabbing bit, will you give it a 'B'?"

They shouted him down and gave it an "X."

The Master apologized for not having a text of the next play—"Coriolanus." But he told them what he knew of it, adding: "It's an interesting play—not a great play—but an interesting one." After much discussion, the group decided the play must be suitable for all audiences, for, as Lady Upright-Chaste said: "If it were smutty, I'd have heard about it." They gave it an "A."

'Them Scotchmen'

Problems arose with the next play: "Macbeth." They concurred that there was an over-emphasis on violence. But they admired the playwright for drawing an accurate picture of Scotland. As Mistress Clean said: "That's how them Scotchmen are." Lord Pure, however, resolved the issue when he pointed out that the play could easily damage England's diplomatic relations with the Scots. They gave it an "X."

"Hamlet" came next on the agenda. After a great deal of talk, they approved a plan whereby they would give the play a kiddie rating if the playwright softened the mother scene in the second act and dropped the ghost bit.

They, then, got to "Othello." Following the Master's synopsis, Lord Pure winced visibly and said: "The minority problem, again. It's always touch-and-go when that's in the plot." They debated for a long time, until suddenly Mistress Clean demanded of all: "Would you want your daughter to see that play?" They gave it an "X."

When "Measure for Measure" came up for consideration, Lord Pure was adamant. He barked: "It started out in the gutter and stayed there!" There was no question: an "X."

When they arrived at a play called "Twelfth Night," the Master said he had received a complaint from the meatpacking industry about a line in the play. A character named Sir Andrew states: "I am a great eater of beef, and I believe that does harm to my wit." The industry contended there was a sales slump in every town where the strolling players performed this play. They gave it an "X."

The meeting was about to end when a clerk entered with a note for the Master. The Master explained: "My staff just came up with some background on the playwright. Seems his father, John, was fined in 1552 for keeping a dunghill in Henley Street. But I see here that he was later cleared of the charge. Turned out the dunghill belonged to a guy named Bacon."

HORACE LIVERIGHT

Publisher, Producer, Shining Star of the 20s and Great Lover and Great Friend—From the Forthcoming "The World of Horace Liveright"

By LESTER COHEN

He was the publisher of Theodore Dreiser, Eugene O'Neill, who hated him), the great historian Hendrik Willem Van Loon, who loved him. And of Sherwood Anderson, Gertrude Atherton, Dorothy Parker and Anita Loos, on whose vast bestseller "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" he lost money because she was better at business than he.

Liveright never really cared for money; he had a mad fixation on having streams of it flowing about him, and flinging it away.

He was the first publisher of Hemingway and Faulkner, and among the Europeans he published Bertrand Russell, George Moore, Jakob Wasserman, Freud, and Roger Martin du Gard who won the Nobel Prize.

He published T. S. Eliot and Robinson Jeffers and Samuel Hoffenstein and Hart Crane. He published five Nobel Prizewinners, and the Modern Library and the Black and Gold Library, and Ben Hecht and Max Bodenheim who fell down the stairs and sometimes disrobed at Liveright parties! . . . and he was, that is Horace Liveright, was the greatest partygiver of the 20s.

Now I know that is subject to argument, because Conde Nast and Jules Glaezner gave fancy parties, and I was at a party given by Mr. Lasky on the stages at Paramount with all the stars of pictures, but still, Liveright's parties, in the old publishing house, where Lillian Hellman and Manuel Komroff and Bennett Cerf and Dick Simon worked for him, were the fanciest parties of all time. You might take or give a few celebrities, take or give a few bottles of champagne, but you could not match them for wit, the handsomeness of the men (W. E. Woodward, for instance, or Tom Wolfe) or the beauty and wit of the women, Elinor Wylie, Dorothy Parker, the Millay girls.

And his parties were sprinkled with people of the town, Jimmy Walker, Otto Kahn, Paul Robeson, Florence Mills and other celebrities of the stage.

Liveright projected in one play, "The Firebrand," by his friend, Edwin Justus Mayer the gave Eddie the money to go to Capri and write the play) and as producer he also projected in this play Joseph Schildkraut, Edward G. Robinson, Frank Morgan.

In The Spirit of The Times

Frank Morgan led a German band, a Hungry Five, picked up on the streets of New York into Horace's second wedding, which became the greatest wild party of all time.

The bride was Elise Bartlett, who had been the first Mrs. Joseph Schildkraut. She was also the second Mrs. Joseph Schildkraut, having married him twice. After that she married Horace, but with Horace once was enough.

She shot him.

She also died in the gutter, in Daytona Beach, under circumstances beclouded by the fate: alcoholism, that pursued Liveright and so many of his brilliant friends, authors, companions:

Hart Crane, published by Horace Liveright, died of drink, or, in alcoholic agony, flung himself over the side of a ship. Mr. Dreiser did not die of drink, but his last years and work were clouded by it. Max Bodenheim, as a drunken beggar, was killed on the Bowery.

The whole great gamut of brilliant people turned into a Beggars Opera. Horace himself, at the end, ciuded his doctors and few friends, was found on the floor of a Brooklyn hotel, surrounded by empty gin bottles.

He is a symbol of the 20s, and I think will be the chief character of an opera of the 20s, because like the heroes of opera and the 20s, fortune favored them with good looks, many manly graces, the love of women and big bundles of money.

And Horace, in the spirit of 1929, had to throw it away. It became more exciting to him to live on the edge of disaster, and in the land of crazy possibility, like the time he staggered into his failing publishing house, crying:

"Boys, we're saved, I'm going to marry—"

This was the heiress to $65,000,000 who had agreed to marry him, but Horace got drunk, broke a date with her, her mother spirited her off to Europe and the engagement was broken.

I think Horace laughed.

FAITH

By JACK DOUGLAS

This morning while I was sitting at my cobbler's bench, working on a pair of high-heeled moccasins (a special order for a queer Indian) I started thinking about Mildred. Mildred, my daughter, and a very lovely girl, who at the moment is studying the marijuana habit by mail, said a profound thing in her sleep last night. She said, "In America you can be anything you want to be or do anything you want to do." And Mildred is so right.

For example, have you ever noticed that little one-legged, hunchbacked, albino newsboy at the corner of Broadway and 46th Street? You know—the one with the itch? Well, 20 years ago he told me that someday he was going to be a little one-legged, hunchbacked albino newsboy with an itch at the corner of Broadway and 46th Street—and by golly he made it. Only in America! Right?

You've got to have faith. Especially in yourself. For instance, Rudy Valle believed he was Rudy Vallee, and after awhile he was. It's as simple as that. Of course, my next door neighbor Ralf Gleckle thought he was Rudy Vallee for a time there, but at the last minute he switched to thinking he was Mrs. Roosevelt and today he is very happy writing his column, lecturing and fighting for the underdog, of which, in case you are unaware, there are plenty. Just look in the Yellow pages of your phone book under "Underdogs" or "Dogs—Under."

Mort Sahl, the Patron Saint of Espresso, once said a very interesting thing about faith. He said that without faith there wouldn't be so darn many recording companies. I think Mort said that. Although it might have been Carl Sandburg (his latest comedy album "The Button-Down Mind Of John Wilkes Booth" didn't do so well).

All through history faith has carried men forward. At Plymouth in 1620 the Pilgrims had nothing but faith. Faith that was almost fanatical—for instance, when they jumped from the boat onto the rock —how did they know they had the right one?

History has many more magnificent examples of faith. When Columbus sailed—how did he know that he would miss America completely? He didn't—but he had faith. And what about the English and Joan of Arc? How could they be sure she was flammable?

One of the greatest incidents of a supreme faith was demonstrated by the first man to eat an oyster. A faith which in turn was emulated and even surpassed by the first oyster to eat a man. This happened only last week at Joe's Bar & Grill & Bar—some drunk teased one and it turned on him. Later the oyster was found to be rabid and they had to shoot it (a pity after that long trip from Chesapeake Bay).

But getting back to faith. Remember Faith Froomby? She was a fandancer at the Chicago World's Fair. She was very famous in her time. Mainly because she had three buttocks. When she sat down there was no doubt about it. Poor Faith Froomby. She isn't with us anymore. She took an overdose of wakeup pills one day and decided to spend the rest of her life seeing "Ben-Hur."

But let's forget the glorious past and think about the future. Your future. You're not going to get anywhere if you don't have faith. Without it you're nowhere. As Norman Vincent Peale so aptly put it—You've got to believe in something. So—if Buddha has failed you—try Susskind.

It's Good To Be Back

By CARL WINSTON

I always assume, and with ample reason, that other people are much smarter than myself. So, when, a few hundred years ago, my friends counselled me to get out of newspaper work while there was still time, I got out. There's no money nor recognition in journalism is what they said.

I went to work on the staffs of several magazines that, happily or unhappily, are no longer extant. I dipped into the wonderful world of publicity, corporate, medical, personal and film. I even had a fling at public relations. And advertising.

Then I freelanced. I wrote a brace of funny books and several million articles of one kind or another.

A few months ago I fell back into newspapering. I feel like the Prodigal Son who has come home after years of profligacy and wandering. I don't imagine the President of the Publishers Association was waiting up with a dish of Fatted Calf, but I'm quite content with my daily salami on rye.

If anyone wants to charge me with suffering from an egregious case of Acidulous Grapitis, I won't even bother to deny it. Just let me tell you why I'm so glad to be back.

Item: there are no office parties in city rooms. No journalist worthy of the name needs an excuse to get drunk.

Item: You do not have to meet interesting people, or be nice to uninteresting people.

Item: You don't have to be nice to newspapermen or women.

Item: A conference in a city room is not called two weeks in advance, usually lasts one minute and is conducted between two persons, the boss and you.

Item: When you write a story that stinks, the city editor throws it back and says "This stinks. Do it again." He does not hold it six weeks, then send you a four-page note that says, in PART: ". . . this doesn't seem to have quite the degree of reader identification we require. It is the feeling of our editorial board that if you rewrite the . . ."

Item: When the day's work is done, you do not have to kid either the boss, yourself or your secretary by taking home a briefcase full of "work" that you know you'll never look at.

Item: Pressagents have to be nice to you, but you can be your own ugly self.

Item: If you happen to get a good idea, you don't have to worry that somebody will swipe it. In fact, nobody will ever use it.

Item: When a rewrite man has nothing to do, he sits with his feet on the desk and (a) reads a paper, (b) sneaks a snooze, (c) dopes the horses or (d) swaps lies with his neighbor. He does not deem it necessary to dictate a meaningless memo through a disinterested secretary to a scheming superior.

Item: When the last edition is put to press, the day's work is done.

All this is not to imply that life on a daily paper is one great big, loud long laugh, that all is sweetness and bright lights and working conditions a Utopian dream.

On the contrary. Most city rooms are blue, if not with four-letter words, with smoke. They're drafty and ingeniously sealed against the ingres of even a whiff of fresh air.

The food you're forced to send out for is unfit for human consumption. The coffee comes in four grades: too hot, too cold, too weak and too strong. Holidays are nonexistent; if you go to work on a paper, say goodbye to Santa Claus. You may never see him—or your kids on Christmas eve—ever again.

The pay? You may earn more than a busdriver, but less than an airline pilot. The hours are unconscionable. The copy boys are insolent and the desk men arrogant. In short, it's a hell of a place to work.

But I love it. And I'm glad I'm back.

Actors, Directors & 'Miscasting'

[Especially When Stars Run Show]

By ROBERT J. LANDRY

At a reputed $1,000,000 fee, the screen's foremost exponent of light romantic comedy, Cary Grant, impersonated a grimly harassed artillery officer in "The Pride and The Passion." He supervised the heaving and hauling of a giant cannon across the face of Spain. Such employment of an urbane talent has since been cited as an example of that much-discussed-but-little-explained aspect of picturemaking, the intermittently recurring embarrassment of "miscasting."

As a general truism "miscasting" is noted in ratio to the prominence of the player although the also-frequently-cited case of "Saint Joan" was to the contrary. In that film the producer-director had dared to assign one of the weightiest roles in all dramatic literature to a then-inexperienced amateur, Jean Seberg.

Naturally nobody sets out to miscast himself or to be miscast. When casting against type or, in the phrase, against the script, the motive is to break new furrows, open new aesthetic possibilities. If successful, such daring draws congratulation. But there is the pitfall, made to seem worse when pictured as a boobytrap, Nor is there unanimity of judgment as to whether miscasting has actually occurred. Time Magazine thought Noel Coward "almost walks off with the show in "Our Man in Havana" but elsewhere Coward was castigated as "about as subtle as an aging interior decorator."

There are, obviously, shades and degrees in miscasting. Playing a Kiowa Indian maiden in "The Unforgiven," Audrey Hepburn was deemed "too polished, too fragile and civilized among such rough types as Burt Lancaster and Audie Murphy" (N.Y. Times). In "The Fugitive Kind," apart from some complaints that it presented a horrid image of life in this country to our fellow-nations, Joanne Woodward's makeup and assigned characterization was rapped as "grotesque."

How Bad Can a Bad Part Make a Competent Actor Seem?

Why do certain players in certain parts seem to draw unusually harsh comment? It does not imply that they are incompetent but rather that what they are asked to symbolize is too far off the target. Illusion will not stretch. Thus Ben Cazzara is described as having been "thoroughly demoralized" by the director in "The Young Doctors" and, another quote, "his secretively immobile face and brassy bearing do not project idealism and integrity." Yet Cazzara got off lightly compared to another actor in another release about the same time who was dismissed as "no longer capable of acting."

Suffice to remark of the actor "no longer capable of acting" that he gets about $300,000 a picture.

A good deal of grumbling greeted Dean Martin as the governor of a state in "Ada." He was charged with doing "an imitation of Dean Martin imitating Bing Crosby." Miscast, in the first degree. Of Wilfred Hyde-White in the same film, Paul V. Beckley (N.Y. Herald Tribune) objected that the Englishman was "utterly and wildly wrong for his part" as an American political boss and yet, said Beckley, forgivingly, "suave and interesting."

'Miscasting' Even Characterized As Deliberately Bad Advice

Again and again the nub of criticism is that the actor did not or could not play the part, or that the part was beyond reasonableness. Thus Ava Gardner in "The Angel Wore Red" was credited for "an interesting try at a patently unplayable role" by the Times.

Hints are sometimes dropped that actors are being conned. Audie Murphy drew the observation that he was "allowing illwishers to convince him to play villains" and he might ruin his career that way. It points up, at least, the extreme seriousness with which "miscasting" is taken.

One reviewer wrote of Eleanor Parker a curious combination tribute and requiem: "She is beautiful, she is talented and she has integrity. She should have become a guest star. Instead she is so consistently miscast one suspects a cabal at work against her."

Nobody forces bad roles upon Burt Lancaster. He may be the actor who most of all has sought and found provocative parts for himself, culminating with "Elmer Gantry" in which Bosley Crowther considered him "con man to the manner born."

Directors, who presumably ought to know more than anybody else about "miscasting," are usually not remarkable for their candor. Does Otto Preminger discuss Miss Seberg? No. Nor do other directors with a whopper or two to their credit. Directors seem to adopt the scriptural injunction, "let him who is without sin cast the first stone." Their delicacy on the subject is understandable. This writer is reminded of a famous Chicago surgeon, a bit of a prima donna and perhaps a genius in his way and day, who dared write a textbook, "The Blunders of Surgery." A confrere of the operating theatre quickly quipped, "Based, no doubt, on your own cases?"

It should be emphasized that directors do not always have the final decision. In the old days when every studio had its own stable of stars and featured players choice was dictated from on high and the director was the victim as often as the actor. Not long ago in the shooting of a film set in the Middle Ages the trade heard that (a) the director blamed his inappropriate cast upon the producer while (b) the producer blamed the director on the company president. Deep lie the roots of miscasting.

The present era of "independent" production does not mean necessarily that the director shares in that new freedom. To the contrary. Great stars always have been given enormous and often fatuous deference and many stars in the past, alongside some of the present, have not hesitated to direct the director. VARIETY in reviewing a British melodrama called "Ferry to Hong-Kong" pointed out an exaggerated instance of a star running wild. The star happened to be Orson Welles who is quite as often a director but in this instance was supposedly working for and under director Lewis Gilbert. The latter could not, or would not, discipline his star with the result that this paper's London man, Dick Richards, decried a conspicuous example of "hammy overacting."

In his recent article for Parade, Lloyd Shearer (who advised fans to follow directors and not stars as a clue to quality) touched on the power of certain present day stars who hire their own directors. This is a modern twist on the casting problem, along with all other problems of production. Shearer quoted George Stevens as stating that it was "most difficult for a director to direct an actor who owns a piece of the film." Doubly difficult if the actor happens to be a millionaire. "Millionaires give direction easily, but they don't take direction easily."

Stevens, listed by Shearer as one of the world's 20 best directors, added this observation:

"I am not about to direct any actor who insists upon rewriting the script or laying down the conditions and hours of work, or casting the production with his pals or telling me how to direct."

It can be argued several ways, and is, as to whether the star system is the cause of "miscasting" or an answer to it. The stars will typically contend that they must have "script approval" to assure themselves not only fat but varied roles. The problem of miscasting is even brought into the debate over "runaway production." It is said, for example, that Anthony Quinn saved himself by going to Italy for "La Strada" some years ago and that a performer like Ernest Borgnine has a very pressing need for roles that will advance, not slow, his artistic momentum.

Meanwhile Frank Sinatra in late years has become the reigning symbol of the glorious Hollywood comeback via Fred Zinnemann's "From Here To Eternity." Prior thereto he couldn't get out of the sailor suit to which he had been "typed." Once established anew, and bigger than ever, Sinatra became a kind of rabbit's-foot for many an on-the-make young producer who dreamed out loud, "If I can interest Sinatra, I'm in." The situation was amusingly underlined when one boy producer in a trade interview named five titles he had in mind and, somewhat naively, described four of the five as "ideal for Sinatra." What happened? Nothing! Sinatra was on his own do-it-yourself kick.

Over the decades Hollywood has perpetuated one production practice in which lurks the hazard of miscasting, namely dropping the age of the heroine 10-15-20 years.

This was, in times past, part of the studio buildup of, say, a Liz Taylor or a Wanda Hendrix and was justified as engineering a studio property. The habit is slow in changing even in the present time. Carol Lynley fell victim in "Return To Peyton Place" when a reviewer quipped, "she looks incapable of reading a book, not to mention writing one." There are, in short, disadvantages as well as advantages in being a pretty young thing.

It was not the feminine child-face alone against which critics sometimes rail. Males, too, draw objection as when Anthony Perkins was cast opposite Sophia Loren and Ingrid Bergman. In the Paris-made "Good-Bye Again" he elicted a range of significant comment from "overdone coltishness" (VARIETY), to "Salinger-like" (Saturday Review), to "a 25-year-old, semi-emasculated mama's boy" (Films in Review). Against which Bosley Crowther of the N.Y. Times considered Perkins "almost carried the picture by himself."

The dangers of trying something different have kicked back against many a player, as per Marilyn Monroe in "The Misfits." Although she drew some testimonials she was also called "blank and unfathomable," and exhibiting "inexplicable lassitude" and, again, burdened by "inappropriate Strasbergian mannerisms."

Of Schools & Techniques Deponent Knoweth Not

Plainly Sam Bronston and Nick Ray took a really drastic calculated risk in casting blue-eyed Jeffrey Hunter as Christ in "King of Kings," though the same picture had another almost equally surprising offbeat casting, Robert Ryan as John The Baptist. Did Hunter or did he not gain important stature as a thespian? Stacking the pros versus the cons it probably amounted to a case, as so often, of like me, like my picture, and the obverse. Interestingly a similar discussion raged—per the film history books—when Cecil B. DeMille cast H. B. Warner, a romantic lover type of 1927, as the Saviour in the silent "King of Kings."

The danger in trying to impersonate Christ need hardly be labored. Suffice that different centuries, different countries and different artists have all had fixed conceptions which no actor could fulfill to universal satisfaction. It is to be noted that some observers who accepted Hunter pictorially could not accept his modern speaking voice.

Writing in Films In Review, Henry Hart made a sharp commentary on the playing of Jesus and his Mother. He begins, "I was incapable of imagining Jeffrey Hunter cast as Christ." Then reports his "face made up and photographed so as to be, at least to my mind and heart, the kind of Christ image that stirs mankind. I grant Hunter's voice is inadequate." What of the Virgin Mary? Here, too, hovered the same hazards of preconception one must presume. Hart considered the Irish actress Siobhan McKenna's interpretation "creative acting of the profoundest sort. Her use of her face and voice, and her bodily postures seemed to me the result of considerable foresight, in order to satisfy the varied conceptions of the Virgin in audiences in all parts of the world." After other comments, Hart makes this startling point: the McKenna performance "should be excised from the film and run off each year in acting schools." No room for doubt at the inn!

How much acting schools influence screen acting will receive no definitive analysis in these present paragraphs. Those who see in "The Method" only a seedbed of beatnik stage business are approximately as violent as those who insist upon divine revelation through Stanislavski. The ostensible purpose of all instruction is to prepare the actor to master his pretense, or to make less than pathetic his inadequacy. Lurking in these misty implications are truisms which relate to "miscasting."

Perhaps because today's films tend to be more "adult" in subject-matter, critical comment on casting is commensurately more sophisticated than in former generations. The French film, "Breathless," drew a curious commentary in Films in Review which saw the film as "amoral" and discerned in Jean Seberg's "young Iowa face, beneath a boy's haircut, a fetich-image for the perverted of both sexes."

Another recent film to draw moral frowns, "Go Naked In the World," provoked many allusions to the "miscasting" of Gina Lollobrigida, Ernest Borgnine and Anthony Franciosa.

The danger of the actor in the wrong role is not a monopoly of the cinema. It is frequently noted on television. Legit, too, has its groans. In the case of a performance repeated night after night, "miscasting" may show tardily if the two minimum essentials, continued intelligible diction and sobriety, are invoked as criteria.

New York is far from the film studios of Hollywood and has very little production of its own. Here, too, there may be an important side-influence. Paris and London are happier in having both stage and screen opportunities within a taxi ride. It is sometimes remarked that the French and British films show rather fewer instances of outright "miscasting," but whether that impression could be document d is moot.

Another area about which scant evidence is in hand concerns bankers. They are the arbiters of loans based upon stars who they accept as "insurance" but which, on occasion, prove not to be. A definitive study of the whole casting and miscasting thing would want to probe the bankers, too. Will a daring genius one day write "The Blunders of Banking?" Don't think there haven't been plenty.

'Party Girl' Films For Skid Row Playoff Blackballs Pix Biz

By THOMAS M. PRYOR

The film industry has developed its own midway in the last year or so—and Hollywood's face is flushed with embarrassment and anger. It's a case where most of the blame (at least in Los Angeles) for the rash of playgirl features has brushed off on the organized industry, which isn't even getting any of the boxoffice comforts to assuage its hurt feelings.

For months, in long winded huddles with Los Angeles city and county officials, the Hollywood industry has been trying to communicate its indignation at, and to shed responsibility for, but willingness to help stamp out, this new wave of "Nudie" product. But the public just can't seem to understand clearly where the dividing line falls, and so Hollywood has become linked with chest cinemantics, too.

Anyway, there's a public for these girlie films, and it isn't only the public that surreptitiously pockets French postcard art. Patrons of these spools sometimes queue up unabashedly under brightly lighted marquees waiting for the spill of other devotees, although the black leather and lumber jacket fraternity are noticeable steadies.

While the spotlight was turned on L.A. as production center of playgirl pix, their producers are not confined to just this geographical area. Reports are that they got the travel urge last summer when the furor began here and the L.A. Police Dept. revealed a total of 35 had been shot in these precincts within a period of two to three months. The farseeing L.A. cops, whose hands were tied because the producers were careful in their filmic exposures not to expose themselves to violations of any local ordinances, noted that there was a "runaway" production problem here, too, with some pix being shot in Tahiti and Mexico.

How 'Lewd'

Question as to whether these playgirl epics are lewd or art is a debatable legal point. However, they are generally haphazardly put together in terms of technique and about the only noticeable directorial "touch" in fact it would be impossible not to recognize is focusing a camera for as much anatomy as the law will tolerate—and it's quite a rubbery law.

The Immoral Mr. Teas," which had more of the old Minsky (before LaGuardia) spirit and production knowhow, kicked up a bit of a storm (mostly of curiosity) when it came out two years ago and reportedly has grossed a million (almost all profit). This, of course, is a better track record than some of Hollywood's two-three million dollar enterprises can claim. Getting reliable boxoffice statistics on these pix isn't easy, but the L.A. police made a study which showed that "Not Tonight, Henry," starring Hank Henry (who claimed scenes of nudies were cut in after his work was done) has grossed more than $500,000 on the West Coast alone.

Whatever their earnings, there's no doubt that naughty nudes are easy profit ventures. Chief reason is that they are put together on budgets which wouldn't have kept Sally Rand in fans in her heyday. A particularly good female form will get its owner $50 for a day in the raw, with a rare beauty pursing as much as $100. Majority of the girls, whose regular trade involves prostitution (or so the police say) or burlesque peeling, average about $25 for 500 feet of film. Some also are coaxed to work for nothing but the glory of possibly becoming another Hedy Lamarr ("Ecstasy").

Most of these pix are easy to spot—by their titles, if nothing else. Little is left to the imagination (which probably wouldn't be the smartest kind of expolitation) as witness this batch of marquee bait: "Bing Bang Detective," "Butterfly and the Canary," "Tom Peeping Bachelor," "The Ruined Bruin," "Party Girl," and "My Bare Lady."

Remember the Police Gazette? You can get it—and some more—now on the not-so-silver screen. All that's missing is the male sanctuary of the old, old barber shop.

REQUIEM FOR NOSTALGIA

[What Was So Good About the Old Days?]

By JACKIE GLEASON

The old days sound better than they lived.

A remark for the ages. Credit a good and ageless crony with the observation: Jack Oakie.

And I quite agree!

The old days are just an antiquarian's dream. They're an echo.

For me—and for lots—they're just the last guffaw of a time when we were doing not too much laughter.

As long as it reminds me of things like goose grease, and hot whiskey and lemonade as a childhood cure-all, I have no rancor with the old days.

I object when it reminds me that on a clear day I used to be able to see the poorhouse.

The only "old days," reminiscently speaking, I enjoy now is when I can sit around with one or two pals, like the perennial juvenile Jack Haley. We become beautiful in retrospection. Like the old sled you remembered as a kid becomes beautiful, as the first peek under the tree Christmas morning becomes beautiful. If you have a good glow going, it helps. It helps make the talk come easier and the memories more amiable than they actually were.

It doesn't count that the atom was just a tiny speck in your spectrum, and not something out to destroy imagination. That the missile gap was only the area between throwing a stone from here to there. That the only Mad Russian was a guy on radio, and fall-out shelter was a rolled-up mattress you put under the baby's swing.

Of late, I have had some reason to be in wholehearted agreement with the observation that "the old days sound better than they lived." Somewhat nostalgically, but not too ruefully, I had a look-in at the old days. Being all prisoners of our own experience, I must tell you what I mean:

Still a Bum

In the last three motion pictures into which my undiminished shadow has pertinently loomed, I've had reasons to reflect on "the good old days." Not in depth, to be sure, but in the shallow, as it were.

To elucidate:

I dressed well enough—fresh carnation, pearl-gray homburg, well-tailored threads—in "The Hustler." But I worked out of dives! I plied my nefarious cue trade in dingy, smoky, spitoon-festooned pool parlors. When I was a kid—in the old days of my lavender legends—I hung out in joints like that. Just like that. I remember all too well.

Then in Paris this summer I made a movie, "Gigot." I play a mute, Gigot. Gigot is a lout. He wears a baggy old potato sack-style getup that is tied together with a rope for a belt, an hoary old Army great coat, ancient vintage, and a big blob of a hat to match.

Gigot sleeps in a dreary hovel on a bed of infested straw. He gets broomed by strangers and brushed by neighbors, has buckets of slop doused on him by irate landladies and intolerant innkeepers. His quarters he shares with such an assortment of cats and other stray creatures that, in comparison, he makes St. Francis of Assisi a case for the ASPCA.

Even this, too, gives me cause to remember.

Now I'm engaged against a school of skillful scene-stealers of the ilk of Anthony Quinn, Mickey Rooney and Julie Harris. Here again, in "Requiem For A Heavyweight," I'm back in memory of those murky yesterdays. I frequent dingy dressingrooms, tawdry back alleys, cheap fleabags and an assortment of the scummy byways of the prizering, environs I once knew as a worshipping boy.

This Is Type-Casting!

What I'm really getting at is: When do I get the present day part to which I've been accustomed? The one that pits me in the upholstered amphitheatre of luxurious living with wine, women and wonderful music. That's type-casting of The Great Gleason mold!

Fee, fie, fo on the old days, say I. For me, no mo of the old days.

Come to think of it, aside from it being that somewhere early before the womb and the tomb, just what are the old days? It's something nebulous, like being "middle-aged." I'm supposed to be middle-aged at 45. But that can only be if I've been assured I'll live to be 90 . . .

The instance I've cited, of course, are movie make-believe. Even so, brushing against it even in a remindful sort of way on a studio-made set, causes a fellow to look back in anger.

Of real life yesterdays, I honestly say there's nothing that makes me want to go back. Sure you get a nostalgic twinge and an I-wonder-what's-become-of-Sal mist—but I couldn't think today of knocking myself out doing a show on the floor of the Queen's Terrace in Astoria, then hop a cab into 52d St. to the 18 Club, sitting gingerly on the edge of the bucket so I wouldn't muss the crease in my trousers, dying little deaths with every click of the meter hoping that I had enough to make the fare, or if the customers would still be in the place when I arrived. Or staying up late at Slapsy Maxie's to entertain the different stratas of Hollywood, doing just one more routine because a new party of swells walked in, doing another funnybit even though you might be tired or sick, or just wanting to be alone. And there were the yesterdays where I spent time telling the tale of a torch to a glass of beer, and all I wanted was a crowd around. Oh, you can be alone anywhere.

Inter It for Aye

The old days envision a pretty picture for me of not so pretty surroundings, of climbing endless tenement stairs to a long succession of cheap railroad rooms, of idle hours hanging around the breadbox in front of the neighborhood store, of entertaining in joints along the Jersey shore for $18 a week, drinking and eating as much as the chef would allow me, then picking up the valise and heading to the next re-port town, then back to New York and the lobbies and the cafeterias.

Thomas Wolfe wrote "You Can't Go Home Again," but then Tom was a loner and probably wanted to. As for me, try as I won't, I cannot reconcile the $35 I got a week at the old Miami Club in Newark, say, for the $35,000 for just a few minutes on a TV special, or the "You name it, Jackie" for a part in a movie in Spain.

What was so glorious anyhow about bringing back deposit bottles just to eat? Hearkening to the good old days calls for a deprivation of a sense of humor and you set yourself adrift in a sea of depression. It's a jeep ride through East Berlin. It's cooking with coalstoves in the flats in the heat of the summer, and it's lunchpails and dumbwaiters, it's holes in the soles and itchy woolen underwear, and it's sitting on the stoop waiting for someone to come back from nowhere. And, usually, recollections of things past is merely a breeze that blows for one alone, only now you don't hear the screams and the hysteria and the weeping that were part of . . . the old days.

Jack Haley's Wheeze

My friend Jack Haley has an "old days" story to tell. It's about the two actors, cold, hungry, out-of-work, who pause as they walk huddled down the street to observe the goings-on on Christmas through the window of an average American home. The cute little darling of the house is still puttering with the unwrappings from her gifts under the tree, delight in her eyes. Mother is wheeling in a succulent-looking turkey, plus trappings. Dad is just stirring snoozily from in front of the crackling fireplace where he's stretched out, slippers off. And one of the peeping actors turns to the others and says, "Squares!" . . .

I'll say no more. A long, cold and slushy Winter lies ahead, friends of mine. I'd just as soon spend it at my own comfortable fireside-in-the-round up Peekskill way than in back of somebody's hallowed old haunt. One Christmas I wanted a red wagon. Santa passed us by that year. I have it now. I don't like it where I am. I can pick up in my red wagon and go. If he's any good at all someday I may even give my chauffeur one of my Academy Awards.

No more old days. Not for me. Alas.
Alas, poor old days.

WHO GETS THE BEEF?

By DON QUINN

Hollywood.

The world's two greatest point-killers, as everyone must know, are waiters and telephones. Most of us have experienced that shattering moment when, lunching with a select group of fun-loving grigs, we've crept up to the punchline of a joke:

US:—"and when the doctor opened the door and saw her lying there with the six new-born babies,—"

WAITER:—"Who gets the eggs?"

We do. All over our faces. I would venture to say that anyone who opens a restaurant with waiters trained to wait for the laugh will probably go into receivership in six weeks. Because, however stiff his basic training, no waiter can maintain a resistance to stepping on a payoff, like this:

US:—"and when her husband beat the guy up and threw him downstairs, battered and bleeding, the guy looked up and said—"

WAITER: "Telephone for Mr. Cliffmeyer."

The fact that Mr. Cliffmeyer is not known to anyone present is beside the point. It simply illustrates the double hazard of waiters and telephones. Singly they are appalling; in combinations they lead to such desperate measures as having your secretary get a coffee-machine and serve the bitter brew at your desk. And even then, such is the malefic nature of any kind of table service and so far-reaching its influence, that your secretary spills java all over the letter you were writing to good old Harry, with the gag about the golf-playing gorilla who—

SECRETARY:—"OOOps! sorry, Chief!"

It's no wonder comedy has gone to hell. How can the majors win pennants with cholera in the training camps? In the face of interruptions by waiters, telephones, sponsors, censors (if I may use a dirty word in a respectable publication) and other inferences, what is its life expectancy? Will the boffola vanish like the buffalo? It will if nobody is ever permitted to get past the straight line.

Ever try to outwit the telephone, on the theory that if you can't lick it you must join it, with this result?

YOU: (ON PHONE) "There was a young lady from Taos,
Who went on a mission to Laos,
But some dirty Rea
Had bugged every bed,
SO SHE——"

HARRY:—"Can you hold it a minute, Pal? Got a call on the other line."

If any ham radio operator ever tries to CQ a joke by bouncing it off Venus, (CENSOR: Cut Venus. Make it Sirius) relaying it by Coast Guard shortwave, to be delivered by a native runner with a cleft stick, the recipient will, in all likelihood, decode it to read like this: "LAST LINE OF MESSAGE DELETED AS VIOLATION OF CONGRESSIONAL AMENDMENT MAKING LAUGHTER SUBVERSIVE."

Point-killing by telephones, waiters and other malign entities must have roots which go deep into the subconscious, finding release from laughter-phobia in interruptive processes. This is a matter deserving of intensive study by trauma critics and ambivalence-chasers. Laughter resists exact slide-rule analysis. Its causes are obscure, but the cure is at hand. Waiters and telephones, in well-spaced doses, working hand-in-hand and foot-in-mouth can halt the epidemic.

Humor in its more obvious aspects is essentially an exercise in perspective and proportion. (Quinn's Law). It un-stuffs shirts, deflates blimps, shrinks heads and generally raises hell with the pompous, the pontifical and the false fronts which disintegrate under derision. It is no wonder that it is avoided by bankers, producers, evangelists and far-right politicos (with the possible exception of Brother Barry Goldwater, whose rear-view-mirror contemplation of events seems to be tempered with a certain wry—or maybe Bourbon—smile). To such characters, sometimes called "pepole," waggery is somehow equated with left-wing deviation, as if any Commissariat would permit the extended existence of the light touch, even a satellite touch.

Have we agreed that the telephone is the focal point of humor-assassination? Shall we concentrate on it, and leave its accomplices, the waiters, to their flatfooted, and probably unwilting, fellow-travelling? All right, let's get to work.

Let's have a National Leave-The-Receiver-Off-The-Hook Week. Or better still, let's abolish the telephone entirely. And while we're at it, make it retroactive. A.T.&T. can convert to homing pigeons, semaphores, and a reactivated Pony Express. Get Congress to vote stingy little pensions for the Alexander Graham Bell and Don Ameche families, in perpetuity, meaning until the next Administration.

Think what removing millions of miles of wires and telephone poles would do for employment. Imagine the improvement in mental health for show business and advertising executives who would finally have a rational excuse for not returning calls.

And maybe the day will dawn when good old Harry can hear a complete joke. That is, if some waiter doesn't shuffle up and say: "A pigeon just hit the coop with a message for Mr. Cliffmeyer. He here?"

MISERABLE MEANING OF MONEY

By WILLIAM SAROYAN

In order even to begin to think about money, it is necessary to understand that the very word is deceptive and has no real, usable, or acceptable meaning.

For instance, if not needed, money is the equivalent either of nothing or of all things of which there is a continuous supply: time, light, air, water and so on.

William Saroyan

If needed, however, money means other things, all of them unavoidably personal.

Furthermore, if there is money but nothing to exchange it for, again its meaning is changed. A millionaire falling out of a window can't buy a repeal of the law of gravity.

On the other hand, a man on the sidewalk, in excellent health, with a good appetite, in possession of no money at all, has no choice but to think about the matter, and finally to agree about a course of action by means of which he may both eat and go on being who he is, or become who he must become, willingly or reluctantly.

In short, a price must be paid by every man for his relationship to the possession of money, the pursuit of money, the want of money, or the rejection of money.

It is not likely that anybody anywhere may be involved in a personal pattern of continuance on all planes of the human experience without at least an awareness of the existence of money.

What is it? What is it for?

Money is deeply tied in with all of the impulses, emotions, intentions, wishes, plans, dreams, desires, and thinking of every human being, from the beginning of memory and awareness to the end of them. It was so with his father, and with his mother, and it will be so with his son and with his daughter. It is there. It is a fact of human being. Its effect on people is probably greater than the effect of anything else. Any notion of God, for instance, is connected in a profound way with having, not having, wanting, getting, trying to get, or trying to find out how not to need to try to get, money. In this light, Job is seen to have been something of a bounder about his God in that he loved God when he had plenty, but was sorely troubled by God when he didn't have plenty and when some of the commonplace vulnerability of the majority of the people finally reached him, in spite of his wealth, with an impact he apparently hadn't suspected was possible.

No Preventative

Wrong is always possible for any man, and for those he loves. The undesirable is always possible, and much of it is predictable and inevitable. To imagine that money will prevent the ultimate arrival of the undesirable is characteristic in one degree or another of everybody, but it is especially true of the intellectually and spiritually underdeveloped. Pain, in all of its varieties, cannot be bought off. Neither can deterioration and death. If the way out of the human experience is the same for all, the way through is not.

Without money, the way through is bound to be different from the way through, with money. He who has not, in the very fact of not having, has, and he who has, in that very fact, has not.

Already, as we have seen, there is clutter and confusion in, around, and about the whole matter: a great deal more that might have been said has not been said, or even implied. It simply is not easy to think accurately about this thing, and I suspect that it is impossible to reach any conclusion that means anything, other than the conclusion that we don't know any*thing* about it.

Still, whole cultures, economic systems, societies, nations, and peoples have come and gone, are coming and going, on the basis of one or another theory about money, matter, possessions, and ownership. And about human will, energy, labor, ingenuity, invention, and the various skills of making, keeping, having, selling, exchanging, or destroying. All of which in turn act upon all human characteristics, good and bad: avariciousness, generosity, exploitation, benefaction, and so on.

One clear fact appears to have persisted from the beginning of known human history: few have, many have not. This is bound to seem, on the face of it, an unfair, an unfortunate, an unjust imbalance. It seems so to many in our times. But the fact remains that, in terms of matter, in terms of money, the situation is not resolvable. To resolve it in other terms has been the impulse of all religionists and most philosophers. Still, there are few among the money-rich who do not affect one or another of the non-materialistic religions. Hence, we must recognize the reality of misunderstanding here: misconception, contradiction, ignorance, helplessness.

And the devil with it. Why should I solve the problem of money in VARIETY.

Who's An Actor?

By GEORGE E. SOKOLSKY

Back in the old days on the East Side of New York, every boy who sang in a choir thought that he was at least an incipient Caruso. So he expected to make Miner's on the Bowery, where, if he did not get the hook, he became a star. Miner's was a wonderful place for ambitious young people because they got a chance. Of course, if a few made good they got to Tony Pastor's on 14th Street.

The Adler clan avoided vaudeville and went straight into the legitimate theatre. Old Jacob P. Adler was a remarkable tragedian who drove his audience to tears. He was a product of the Goldfaden theatre which started in Rumania and wondered through Southern Russia and finally landed in New York where it produced a Yiddish theatre which has had an enormous influence on Broadway. Stella and Luther Adler are but two of Jacob's children. He had many—so many in so many different countries, that he lost count of the mothers. But he was a great actor and his Shylock once seen was never forgotten. He even made Shakespeare human.

Few of the young boys and girls on the East Side wanted to star on the Yiddish stage. Their ambition was Keith's and Proctor's vaudeville houses or to be able to emulate David Warfield who really made it on Broadway.

Back in those days, dialects were amusing. Nobody took offense. So a boy could speak like his father spoke English and if you understood him, it made everybody laugh. What could be funnier than to hear Harry Cooper sing in dialect. It came so naturally. Harry Cooper's father was the cantor in the Pike Street synagogue and was more respected than most cantors because he was a scholar and a man of refinement. His sons were actors, more or less successful, but Harry was the real hit. The Empire City Quartet, of which he was a member, got top billing in vaudeville.

Quite a number of cantor's sons and daughters aspired to vaudeville, and the best of them were recruited by Gus Edwards. His "School Days" and "Sun Bonnet Sue" always made a hit. It was in Gus Edwards' show that Eddie Cantor got his start. I am told that Jessel was also in this show but I do not recall him, but I vividly remember Fanny Brice.

Eddie Cantor was a beloved kid. He lived with his grandmother who was the janitor of a four story, cold water, walkup tenement. So who cared? Everybody was still poor. Eddie did not belong to Barber Shop chorus. He did not stand on the corner to mash girls. He belonged to the Camp Club of the Educational Alliance and that meant that he had intellectual aspirations. We were at the Surprise Lake Camp together and already he could make other boys laugh just by looking at them. Eddie had a big heart but no money and all the boys loved him but it never occured to any of us that he would make such a success in life. He seemed to have nothing but good humor and laughter in his soul.

A Quotable Critic

By GERALD PRATLEY

Ottawa.

How do you become famous as a film critic?

One way of course, is to be quoted in the advertisements; but to be quoted you have to write something quotable. There is an art to this. Take my old friend Claude Gilman as an example. He writes for the Cablegram, and he knows just what to say that will get him into the ads week after week. One of his favorite devices is to end a favorable review by saying, with all due solemnity, "I found this film so good I intend to see it again at the earliest opportunity."

Now we all know that critics have neither time nor inclination to see films twice, but this doesn't deter Claude. Sometimes he varies this and makes it even stronger by saying, "Although I have seen 'Sunday Night and Monday Morning' twice I intend to visit it again for the third time at the earliest opportunity." This sends the fellows in the advertising department's wild with joy and the next day the ads in the paper blossom forth with the announcement "worth seeing for the third time" —Gilman, Cablegram.

Underneath this will be the adjectives: "stunning" — Kirkleby, the Daily Moon; "magnificent" —Hank Polshot, Morning World and Post. We now from long experience of course that the critic has probably written "this is a miserable film, but Miss Diedre Morrow gives a stunning performance." Or, "there isn't much to admire about this film except its magnificent photography by Walter Slump Jr. who is marking his 80th year in Hollywood."

But my colleague Claude, a wise old bird, has so many other quotables which find their way into ads with regularity at certain fixed times of the year. For example, in January he is prone to write: "Although the year is yet young, I have no hesitation in saying that when the time comes to choose the ten best pictures of the year, Hitchcock's 'Drunko,' the story of an alcoholic, will be high on my list."

And sometime after the Academy Awards have been doled out, Claude will fall into musing in the following way: "Although Academy Award time is many months away, I have no hesitation in saying that Miss Diedre Morrow's performance in "Angel, You're No Baby," will win her an Oscar, or a nomination to say the least."

Over 210 Features In 1961: Italy's Unprecedented Boom

By ROBERT F. HAWKINS

Rome.

Label it as you like, 1961 has been a great year for the Italian motion picture. Not only has it scored success after success on the home market, but its invasion of foreign marts has been a source of discussion — and statistics — throughout the year. Penetration in depth of the Yank market by such pix as "Dolce Vita," "Two Women," and "Rocco and his Brothers" are other signs of strength, as are the prizes Italo product won at almost every major festival during another busy festival year.

Though definitive figures are still being totted up, home-market statistics point to a slight drop in attendance and a rise due to higher ticket tabs in total gross. More than to ty, which only in November began 2nd channel telecasts, the lower admission figures are credited to a higher standard of living and the consequent lure of the outdoors, via increased circulation of cars, etc.

There is no doubt, however, that all previous production records have been topped by 1961's 210-odd feature total. Up also are the number of coproduced pix and of features made in Italy by Yank companies, either via combos with Italo producers or on an autonomous basis, as has been abundantly reported in these pages in recent months. Not surprising that more Yank thesps than ever before have gravitated into the local orbit.

For the record, therefore, list 210 features produced during 1961 (as against 194 for 1960), some 450 documentaries and 600-odd newsreels. 98 coproductions (vs. 83 for 1960). 745,000,000 admissions (compared with 746,000,000 in 1960), and a total gross very roughly estimated in the vicinity of $198,000,000 ($193,000,000 for 1960). Imports are expected to have dropped some under last year's 337 feature total, while exports are surely up considerably over the 1960 figure of 3,661 licenses (half-year total already had topped the 2,000 mark).

Happy Surprises

The 1961 boxoffice race has been a sometimes unpredictable one—notable surprises were provided by several low-budget arty items by young Italian directors which grossed unexpectedly important figures—and final picture is not yet completely clear, also as totals on several important December releases have still to come in. As of December 1st, 16 features had topped the 100 Million Lire ($160,000) mark in key city firstruns. Six of these were Italian, ten American.

In order, they are "Guns of Navarone" (Columbia), "Two Enemies" (DeLaurentiis), "Don Camillo, Monsignore Ma Non Troppo" (Cineriz), "Exodus" (UA), "Il Federale" (DDL), "Goodbye Again" (UA), "Spartacus" (U-I), "The Last Judgment" (DeLaurentiis), "Come September" (U-I), "World at Night No. 2" (Italian-Warners), "Two Rode Together" (Columbia), "The Naked Edge" (UA), "The Hustler" (20th), "La Viaccia" (Arco), "Two Loves" (Par), and "One-Eyed Jacks" (Par).

Distribs rankings, still based on key firstruns, sees Dear Films (UA product) leading, followed closely by Dino DeLaurentiis, Columbia, Cineriz, Paramount, Universal, Warner Bros., 20th, Metro, and others. DeLaurentiis leads Dear and Universal in the gross-per-pic averages.

Don't Discount Beefcake

Production-wise, Italian companies are still going full tilt ahead. Beefcake items, despite reported "resistance" (mainly lower prices) in certain foreign areas, are still in big demand; there's been a recent resurgence of pirate pix and of items set in the Fascist days. Other strong contenders are the "World at Night" items and their imitations. Surprising strength, as noted, have been shown by offbeat prestige pix, such as "Accattone" (Arco), "La Viaccia" (Arco), "Il Posto" (Titanus), and others which in previous years might not have reached the general public, but whose current success has encouraged other productions of this kind.

Arco Films is a case in point. Alfredo Bini's new company probably constitutes the Italo success story of the year, having made its impact with only three features, all vastly successful both from critical and b.o. viewpoints: "Bell' Antonio," "La Viaccia," and "Accattone." Company has since wound "A Cavallo della Tigre," directed by Luigi Comencini, and "I Nuovi Angeli," directed by Ugo Gregoretti, and is about to start a Gina Lollobrigida starrer, "La Bellezza d'Ippolita," directed by Giancarlo Zagni. Also upcoming on the Arco roster are two Anna Magnani starrers, "Mamma Roma," which Pier Paolo Pasolini directs in March, and "Sagapo," to be directed by Roberto Rossellini in September. Finally, Arco will make "L'Armata Brancaleone," directed by Mario Monicelli, "Il Comissario," directed by Luigi Comencini, and "D'Amore si Muore," directed by Giorgio De Lullo, all during 1962.

Atlantica is currently setting up "Scipione Africano," slated as a Rossana Podesta starrer and to be shot on African locations, and is planning a "Divine Comedy." Cineriz will team with Royal on Gina Lollobrigida's upcoming "Imperial Venus," and has deals with Federico Fellini and Michelangelo Antonioni for their next features, other items to be announced later.

Other Rosters

Dino DeLaurentiis sports an impressive roster. "Barabbas," "The Best of Enemies," "The Last Judgment," "Black City," "Congo," "The Italian Brigands," "It's a Hard Life," "I Love, You Love," "The Mounted Policeman," "Maciste Vs. the Vampire," were all made in 1961 and are in current release. Upcoming on the DeLaurentiis slate are "Black Soul," directed by Roberto Rossellini; "A Summer Sunday;" "The Stranger," from the novel by Albert Camus, to be directed by Mauro Bolognini; "The Trial of Ciano," to be directed by Carlo Lizzani; "Tommy the Gumrunner," with Jack Palance; "Metello" directed by Mauro Bolognini; "The Life of Chet Baker." Not forgetting, of course, DeLaurentiis' mammoth "The Bible" project, on which Christopher Fry is currently at work.

Cino Del Duca, currently handling foreign release for "Accattone," has still to announce upcoming projects, as does Dear Films, which last year completed "Jessica" and participated in "Lolita" and "El Cid."

Documento Film has just wound "The Prisoners of Devil's Island," with Guy Madison, and "Il Giustiziere dei Mari," with Richard Harrison, and has started "Black Soul." This Roberto Rossellini pic will be released, via a deal which includes other Documento pix, such as the aforementioned "Metello" and "The Life of Chet Baker," by Dino DeLaurentiis. Also on Documento's agenda: "La Banda Casaroli," directed by Florestano Vancini, with Tomas Milian starred.

Cineproduzioni Associate, which releases via FILMAR Export, has completed "The Colossus of Rhodes," "Goliath and the Giants," "The Conqueror of Maracaibo," "Sansone," and "The Wrath of Hercules," and is currently prepping: "Anno 79 Dopo Cristo," "The Valley of Swords," "The Giant of

FLATTERY IS GETTING US NOWHERE

[IMITATORS HAVE SURPASSED ORIGINATORS]

By ARTHUR MAYER

There is a current story about a man who when asked "How is your wife?" replied, "Compared to what?" He was, of course, right because how can you tell how anything is unless you have something with which to compare it? I cannot talk in comparative terms about wives—I have had the same one for some 49 years. I find no difficulty, however, comparing movies with other phenomena of American life. From coast to coast we use the same dentifrices, depilatories, detergents and deodorants—and we like the same movies. If "The Guns Of Navarone" holds them out at the N. Y. Criterion, it is sure to do so also at the Star in Copper Gulch. If "The Hustler" clicks at the Broadway Paramount, it will be equally popular at all the other Paramounts scattered across the countryside.

As for the basic principles on which all American industries operate, they are fundamentally so much alike that an outstanding movie executive like Barney Balaban could overnight become the successful president of a railroad or a steel corporation.

The manufacture of automobiles, for example, would seem to have little in common with the production of movies. For years, however, both industries have operated on the assumption that bigger and better were practically synonymous. The auto makers concentrated on ever-longer, wider and more powerful cars. We put our faith in blockbusters. When business dipped they resorted to gadgets like fishtail fins and two-tone jobs. We turned to widescreen processes and stereophonic sound. Observing the rising popularity of foreign cars, particularly among the status-minded, younger set, the automobile magnates unwillingly introduced compacts. Equally reluctantly the moviemakers, impressed by the demand particularly among the intellectuals for so-called adult foreign films (adult being a polite equivocation for sexual frankness) relaxed their Code requirements so that they, too, could deal with such intriguing subjects as homosexuality and lesbianism.

More and more American business is not only copying our methods of merchandising but excelling us in our long-vaunted showmanship.

Everybody selling anything is now our competitor. Drugstores and bowling alleys open with more hoopla, searchlights and distinguished personalities than movie premieres. Shopping centres and new hotels engage in super-exploitation campaigns conducted by former movie exploiteers. Cigarets and painkillers are advertised with more superlatives and hyperbole than we ever dared to use, and ladies' bras, girdles and panties display the femme form divine with detail and decolletage that would probably land a picture publicist in the hoosegow. Imitation may be the sincerest form of flattery but it is more flattening than flattering when our sawdust circus tradition of sensational, eye-arresting advertising is stolen from us by a lot of Johnny-come-latelies.

In the field of spectacular production we are achieving miracles, moving on to ever-vaster and more impressive accomplishments; but advertisingwise we are resting on our laurels at the rear of the procession. Very frankly, our merchandising does not seem to me have changed fundamentally in any respect in the past 40 years.

The gifted pioneers established a formula and we have stuck with it while others first copied it and then surpassed it.

Need New Sales Methods

If our pictures are going to be more lavish and more stupendous, more imaginative than ever before dreamed of, we must sell them in a more lavish, more stupendous, more imaginative fashion than ever before. We cannot do this by decimating our advertising departments or replacing experienced men with lower salaried people. As our brilliant advertising chiefs such as Youngstein, Lazarus and Pickman, moved up to higher echelons, they have been replaced by younger men. These men have plenty of ability but they have to be backed up by their organizations.

If we are going to spend millions for stories, millions for sets, millions for actors, we must also spend millions for merchandising. We must think in new terms or at least in old terms greatly magnified, to meet our current needs and the competition of other seekers of public approval: parades with stunning displays of coming attractions more sensational than the annual Macy parade; nationwide tours of actors, authors, directors and technicians; attractive, colored supplements in newspapers and magazines; television trailers that will make all previous tv commercials look tawdry and insignificant; campaigns to establish new stars so impressive and far-reaching that the Gables, Coopers and Bogarts of the future will arise to replace our beloved, lost favorites. Ask any good motion picture advertising man and he will have at his fingertips a dozen other things that we should do and that we could do if the necessary funds were made available—the things that would once more make motion pictures the favorite topic of public discussion as they still are the favorite entertainment of the American people.

And New Showcasings

We also need a new kind of theatre in which to show our new kind of pictures. To roadshow them in old legitimate theatres or even to open them in the decaying firstrun house of the early '30s is like displaying precious jewels in a 5-&10c store window.

When I visit a museum like the Guggenheim I am impressed by what architects, armed with imagination and modern building techniques, can accomplish.

Now that new, enclosed theatres are again being built we must revolutionize our ideas of what such theatres should be like. The day of the picture palaces is not over. It is only that we need a new kind of picture palace.

Who is going to stay home to watch formula tv shows, free or fee, on little screens in little living-rooms, with nothing on an impressive scale except the commercials, if they can see great new features on mammoth widescreens amid beautiful surroundings in superb comfort and with perfect sound reproduction, with cars parked beneath the auditorium and children cared for by trained nurses?

Once again we can and we must make moviegoing what it used to be—an exciting, memorable aspect of American family life.

BALLAD FOR BROADWAY

By MILTON BERLE

Now that I'm returing to the mazda-drenched Main Stem, which occupies carefully-preserved, precious chapters in memory's book, I must say, "Long time, no Broadway." And everyone knows when something must be said, I'll say it.

Yes, it's been a long, long time since 1943-44 when I was in "Ziegfeld Follies," and then played the Carnival in what used to be the Capitol Hotel. (Of course, sheer modesty compels me not to mention that my still-standing record-run-for-a-nite-club at the Carnival was so long. I probably could have outlasted the hotel itself and become "My Fair Laddie.")

Since those last nostalgic years on Broadway, much water has passed under the bridge. (In fact, they've since built new bridges, and tunnels, too, for water to pass under and over.) When I return in the spring in Harold Prince's musical, "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum," I'll find many funny things have happened to Broadway during my absence. (And, incidentally, a funny thing happened to me in the intervening years on a new entertainment medium called television.)

Time, like it does with folks, has inflicted deep wrinkles in the once glamorous face of beloved, bewitching Broadway, but time, in all its relentless ruthlessness, has failed to dim its glittering stature as The Street of Streets. Though just a rhinestone version of yesteryear's bejeweled Broadway, it is still the mecca of out-of-towners on the town and where Bronx, Brooklyn, Queens and Staten Island meet up with Manhattan.

Though it still draws the crowds as it always did, Broadway has certainly changed. The thoroughfare Winchell labeled "The street of the soft shoe and the hard knock" has become the street of the soft drink and the hard pizza. There is almost as much juice coming out of Broadway's drink stands as its bright lights, and pizza palaces are vying with picture palaces. The new kind of dough on Broadway is now part of New York's Pieline.

Vaudeville has practically disappeared and its rooting galleries have given way to shooting galleries. (Remember when it was the performer who made his mark on Broadway instead of a guy in a shooting gallery?) The very wonderful Radio City Music Hall, with its stageshows, is gallantly and gloriously carrying the torch for vaudeville, which has regretfully faded into show business' past tense.

With the dazzling dream that was once Times Square turning into a nightmare of 42d-run Street movie houses, many of the theatrical agencies and offices have left the area. It looks like Broadway-and-42d St. has packed itself up and moved to 5th Ave. and 57th St. It was once said (in fact, more than a million times) that if you stood at Broadway and 42d St., the crossroads of the world, long enough, you would meet everyone you know. Nowadays, if you stand there just for a short time, you'll meet a lot of people you wouldn't care to know.

Fabulous Invalid

Sadly enough, most of the Broadway I knew and loved has gone. Only the stalwart legit theatre remains intact, and, like an aging wine, seems to grow better with the passing years. It was always Broadway's strongest lure and today more so than ever. It is the kind of tasty entertainment that is good to the last flop.

Funny thing (and I only use it to plug my upcoming "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum"), playgoers across the country and Canada rarely enjoy a Broadway show, even with the original cast, in their hometown as they would on its homegrounds. Unless the curtain is on Broadway, a curtain just isn't a curtain. (If I sound Gertrude Steinish, just remember she could have said the same thing better in a more redundant manner.)

Seeing a Broadway show on Broadway is the intangible something which sets Broadway above and beyond the ambitious Broadways of the world. (All of which should make me the first writer to use "Broadway" four times in the same sentence. Chalk it up as another record I set.)

If Shakespeare were alive today, he would have amended his time-honored quote to read: "The play's the thing, only if it's on Broadway." I'm certain the Bard would have said it this way. I really should know. After all, wasn't my first serious serious novel, "Earthquake," published on his birthday? Incidentally, my book sold like hot quakes—and did that keep the seismologists busy!)

The legit theatre is the last link between the old Broadway I knew professionally and the current version. When I worked the Big Boulevard it was, more or less, a street of individual talents. Today, it's one of individual units, mostly rhythm or rock-'n'-roll groups. (Con Edison knew what it was doing when it came out with "Dig We Must.")

The new show business on Broadway is the record industry. No longer are its phone booths the offices of agents. Today, the Broadway phone booths are the rehearsal halls for harmony teams. A common sight is seeing "Twisters," on the run (and they should be) rapidly rehearsing lyrics, which no one will be able to understand anyway.

Among other things, Broadway is also Spin Pan Alley, with record shops mushrooming on it. (I understand they have my favorite album, "Songs My Mother Loved," which, incidentally, I ...ed.) The current complaint in the 7th Ave. garment district is that the needle business is better on Broadway.

Broadway was a colorful conglomeration of many things. It still is, but of many other things. And what it has is more interesting on Broadway than it is anywhere else. Even its parking lots. First of all, you can't get your car into them. Secondly, if you finally do sardine your way into one, you can't afford the rates. It's cheaper to buy a new car than to park it there more than an hour. It's also cheaper to pay the parking fine on the street than the parking fee.

To get back to Shakespeare, whom I now ... into this article some paragraphs ago, he would ... Parking is such street sorrow." But I'm afraid ... said it first. There is one thing to be said for parking lots—Broadway lost so many buildings that way.

I have often been told that Broadway is getting to look more and more like Coney Island and all it needs is the ocean backdrop. In fact, the other day at Times Square, I was stopped by some out-of-towners who asked me: "How many blocks to the ferris wheel?"

Let them call Broadway, Coney Island, which is synonymous with "Having Wonderful Time, Glad We're Here," it still has that hypnotic hold with its magic mazdas and fabled footlights. For me it is still Toney Island and I'm glad to be coming back to Broadway in "A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum."

European Viewpoint On What's Wrong With U.S. Pix

By CARL FOREMAN

London.

When I was in Brussels recently for the premiere of "The Guns of Navarone," I had (naturally) a press conference. Afterward, I got into a private chat with Marc Turfkruyer, who is one of the top Belgium critics and film journalists, and a familiar face on the juries of various of the European film festivals. Unlike many film critics, he is one who really likes the medium, and the business as well. (I separate the medium and the business deliberately). I utilized this meeting with Turfkruyer to turn the tables by asking him a number of questions, which made a pleasant change. Man-bites-dog in Brussels.

I queried him about the European film festivals. Personally, I have mixed feelings about the festivals. I am in favor of the theory, but in practice I think there are far too many of them, and that they've got out of hand. I also think they are inclined to be snobbish, phoney-arty, culturally hypocritical, and it wouldn't surprise me any if it turned out that many of them were fixed. I'm not going to name names, because there's an old family tradition against that, but if the shoe fits, they can put it on. Anyway, and despite all that, I'm still for the festival idea, and (parenthetically) I think both Edinburgh and San Francisco should be encouraged and helped.

But to get back. Here is the result of my interview with M. Turfkruyer, without comment, and the reader can draw his own conclusions. Perhaps I could have asked better questions; in fact, I'm sure I should have. I can only say in excuse that I wasn't prepared. Nevertheless, I want the right, from now on, to call myself an ex-VARIETY mugg:

FOREMAN: Isn't it a fact that most festival juries are prejudiced against U.S. films even before they view them?

TURFKRUYER: No. I am convinced that no conscientious jury member at whatever festival is prejudiced against the U.S. film, but that he keeps to ways of consideration that differ from those applied in America.

F: You won't deny that many good films come out of Hollywood. Then why don't we do better at the festivals?

T: It stands to reason that lots of good films are made by the U.S.A., but even in these pictures the mere commercial angle is too much stressed, and for this reason spectacular or sentimental effects play too big a role in them. Seen from this point of view, the cultural value of Hollywood pictures sinks considerably, and so much more, because there is a need to adapt things to the intellectual level of the average American patron, which generally remains beneath that of the normal adult in Europe.

F: I see. But don't you agree by and large that U.S. films are better made than films from anywhere else?

T: There is no necessity of sending highly spectacular pictures to a festival, whatever may be their technical value, because of their general lack of contact with true life. Those films may be excellent b.o., but this is another question, beyond every connection with festivals. The only really important thing is, that a film must fulfill the requirements of a festival film, and at the same time it should be suited for the mass public. If these two conditions are fulfilled, business will be served best.

F: Can you be more specific about what you think is culturally wrong with American films?

T: Too sweet and cheap romance, with a view to the classical and ever so easy happy end that carries on a sense of well-being for the onlooker—a very frequent ingredient in American pictures—contrasts totally with the spirit of our time. Add to this the moral restrictions imposed on the American producer by organizations such as the Legion of Decency and the like, and which are completely contrary to the natural urge toward freedom of thought in modern man—and especially in European young people, the best of all, patrons, who are sexually more precocious than their congenerates in the U.S.A., because of our educational system without every shade of puritanism, and which prepares the European youth for life earlier than the young American.

F: What do you have to say about the choice or selection of American pictures to represent American films at the festivals?

T: The selection of pictures which have to represent the U.S.A. are very often rather pitiable.

F: That was short and sweet. Would you care to add anything to that last statement?

T: As they are not genuine, but inflated and stripped of all real life basis, it is natural that they cannot find any favor in the eyes of a serious jury. They are considered as mere entertainment, without any use for the real motion picture art.

F: Do you think that the so-called "New Wave" films represent anything important for the cinema?

T: Although I do not rave particularly about the so-called "New Wave," I am convinced that precisely by this new movement the cinematographic art has been established to score big new successes. Of course, there will come an evolution, but the way back will prove impossible.

F: Any further comments?

T: If we cast a look on the awards which Hollywood carried off in European festivals, we see that only those films which really had something to tell were classified at the top. At Cannes, for example:

1946—"The Lost Weekend."
1947—"Crossfire."
1955—"Marty."
1957—"Friendly Persuasion."

'Monkey See...'

By GEORGE JESSEL

I was at the Eichmann trial in Jerusalem last summer, listening as best I could to the evidence, most of which I couldn't understand. But I certainly could tell even from the monotonous reading of the translation that Eichmann was not getting any Academy Award!

George Jessel

There was a recess, and I left the building.

There were a lot of people outside who were not able to get in, and quite a number of Americans who immediately gathered around me to ask questions.

Also leaving the courtroom with me was a newspaperman from Miami—McLemore by name—whose only comment was: "I wish this thing was over—I even miss the Fontainebleau in Miami Beach . . ." I had a bright answer like: "I don't blame you . . ." or something, and stopped to light one of the last of my stylish cigars.

My Miami newspaper friend changed the trend of the conversation.

"How do you feel," he said "when you hear these newcomers do your old stuff on tv and in the night clubs, like calling your mother and all your old bits? Doesn't it get you sore?"

"No—", I answered (lying!) "I don't mind it at all as I can always think of something new."

By this time, a family from Brooklyn got into the conversation and, in typical Brooklynese, the mamma said: "I wanna tell you, Mr. Jessel, I've always enjoyed your work on the stage."

I haven't been on the stage in almost 20 years; nevertheless, I said, "Thank you very much, ma'am."

"And I agree," she went on, "with this young man who says that so many people are stealing your act. They hear you do it, so they do it themselves . . . Like my grandmother—may she rest in peace—used to say: '—monkey see—monkey do' . . ."

And strangely enough, this ancient saying: "—monkey see—monkey do . . ." struck a chord in my memory, and somehow connected itself with Eichmann, whose cage I had just left. And as I said goodbye to McLemore—who stepped into a bar to drink some Israeli beer—it suddenly occurred to me that Adolf Eichmann resembled so much another German, by the name of Hanzmann, of Hanzmann's Dogs & Monkeys. I remembered playing on the bill with that act at the Folly Theatre in Brooklyn way back in 1918! I even remember the date. It was March 6, 1918; the day my aunt Mary got married.

There were six acts on the bill. I was on fifth, and the closing act was Hanzmann's Dogs & Monkeys. He had about 10 dogs and two monkeys—a large one, and a little one. The little one was being groomed to take the large one's place should anything happen to it.

Quite a Trouper

This large monkey was quite a trouper! He used to do absolutely everything that Hanzmann, the trainer, did. Hanzmann would put on a strawhat—so would the monkey. Hanzmann would put a pipe in his mouth—so would the monkey. Hanzmann would get on a bicycle and ride around the stage—so would the monkey. At the end of the act, Hanzmann would pick up an American flag for his exit—and so would the monkey.

However, once in a while, the monkey had trouble picking up the flag, and would drop it. And of course, when that happened, it affected the final applause—which infuriated Hanzmann. And so, when the curtain would come down, Hanzmann would take a miniature baseball bat, and beat the monkey on the head with it. He'd keep on doing this all the way from the stage to the dressing room, and the screams of the little animal were so loud that the audience could hear them over the silent film which had come on. So much so that the stage manager and myself and a couple of people from the other acts were gradually getting to hate that German, and we made up our minds that if he ever hit his monkey again, we would gang up on him.

Then, for a couple of shows, nothing happened. But one evening, the monkey dropped the flag again, and Hanzmann hit him with the bat once, and went upstairs to his dressing room, the monkey perched on his shoulder. The gang waited a few minutes expecting to hear the monkey scream again, but there was no sound; and since the next show didn't go on for about an hour and 45 minutes, we started playing poker until the picture was over, and the vaudeville came on.

Then, one by one, the acts went on stage. My turn came, and as I was closing my bit with "Hello—mamma . . .?" the stage manager signaled to me to keep on talking, as Hanzmann had not come down yet from the dressingroom.

I stalled as long as I could, and then, as Hanzmann still wasn't making an appearance, I joked about it to the audience, saying the animals had gone on strike as they wanted more money.

The audience accepted this bit pleasantly enough, and the picture went on again.

Backstage, we all rushed immediately upstairs to Hanzmann's dressingroom, knocked on the door, but got no answer. Finally we broke in and found Hanzmann's body on the chair in front of the dressing table, his head lying on the makeup shelf, oozing blood.

He was dead.

And what had happened was as easy to figure out as anything you have seen a flatfoot do on television. A stick of greasepaint was on the floor close to his limp arm. It had evidently slipped out of his hand as he was putting on his makeup—as the American flag so often slipped out of the monkey's hand on stage. And the monkey, who had been taught so diligently how to imitate him, picked up the miniature baseball bat and had beaten him to death. And now the monkey was standing in the corner, gleefully jumping up and down, with the bat still in his hand, an impish grin on his face, as if to say: "See . . .? See how well I did my trick?"

One of the stagehands went down to phone the police, and I suggested that we call Hanzmann's booking agent to come and take the monkey away. Then, while we all just stood there waiting, Mrs. Fennevesy, the wife of a Dutch comic who was also on the bill, turned to me and said: "Well, there you are . . . Just like my grandmother used to say . . . 'Monkey see—monkey do' . . ."

Sex Not Whammo In 1961 Rentals; Annual Chart

By GENE ARNEEL

Carl Foreman's "Guns of Navarone," made with Columbia, Isle of Rhodes locationed, and topbilling Gregory Peck, David Niven and Anthony Quinn, is first on the boxoffice bigtime list for 1961. (See adjoining chart).

Roster for 1961 includes some features which went into domestic release too late in 1960 for estimation last year. By the same token, certain productions which got to market too late in '61 are missing from present list.

Estimates as to "money in hand" —means rental revenues already on the distributors' books. Projections of money yet to be earned covers the full market playoff on a first-around. VARIETY's, obtains its data by a system of via check and cross check with responsible sources and its own data.

It must be stressed that foreign rentals are not included but the rule of thumb has it that in most cases a film will take about the same amount of revenue from overseas markets that it does at home—home being the United States and Canada; overseas every place else.

Foreman's World War II epic anent a Nazi big-gun stronghold overlooking the Mediterranean, according to this paper's check, has rentals so far of $8,600,000 and looks on its way to an ultimate take of perhaps $12,500,000. This represents robust success, placing "Navarone" second to "Bridge on the River Kwai" in Col's own list of tallest coin producers in this company's history.

No. 2 in 1961 wrapup is Otto Preminger's "Exodus," lensed in Israel in alignment with United Artists. Undertaking was given respectable treatment by critics and public alike. Release with Paul Newman, Eva Marie Saint, Sal Mineo and Peter Lawford, so far has registered $7,350,000 in domestic rentals and the total anticipation is $10,000,000.

A striking aspect of the rundown of 1961's b.o. leaders is the fact that those at the top were sans elements of offensiveness. Nobody had qualms about moralistic content during a year when the puritans were in unusually strong voice. The "righteous" doubtless will feel more fortified than ever with results showing there's not a single sexpot or hotsy expression of sex in any of the first six money winners.

From Walt Disney-Buena Vista came the pictures in third, fourth and sixth positions, these being respectively "Parent Trap," "Absent - Minded Professor" and "Swiss Family Robinson." The moppets, teenagers and Mom & Dad provided Disney and his Irving Ludwig-headed distribution company with boxoffice returns of orbital dimensions. These three "family" items are headed for a combined gross of $26,300,000.

Large in the sweepstakes, in fifth spot, is John Wayne's "Alamo," also through UA, also devoid of deviation and such folderal. The anticipation is $8,000,000.

Hasty conclusions as to sex going out of screen fashion are not to be drawn, because there was still room near the top for the boy-girl shenanigans in Universal's "Come September," "Paramount's "World of Suzie Wong," Warners' "Splendor in the Grass," etc.

WB has a couple of bigtimers in "Fanny" and "Sundowners" which seem to later become even bigger. Both were withdrawn from release before fully playing the market, with the idea of giving them a whirl in Academy Awards contention. They'll be returned to exhibition after the Oscar citations and, win or lose, it's a cinch that "Fanny" will go well above its present $4,500,000 listing and "Sundowners" over its $3,800,000.

Making more music at the b.o. was David O. Selznick's perennial repeater "Gone With the Wind," owned and operated by Metro. Coverage on "Wind" in

ALL-TIME TOP GROSS FILMS

[OVER $4,000,000, U.S.-CANADA]

The titles listed below put the perspective of time and box-office upon the great rental-earners of the film industry. Though published annually in the Anniversary Edition, this list is not static but is revised regularly in the light of history and improved data. A film must reach $4,000,000 to be included in this compilation. But a release which is included for the first time, on the basis of expected collections not yet in, may possibly be shrunken or enlarged a year or more later.

"Gone With The Wind," it will be noted, resumes No. 1 position this year, having been nosed out last year by "10 Commandments." Explanation of the comeback lies, of course, in another reissue of the Confederate drama.

The estimate of $40,000,000 for Metro's "Ben Hur" is based on $32,000,000 already taken in plus the anticipation of another $8,000,000. In contrast, the leader, "Wind," already has reaped the $41,200,000 as tallied herein.

To anticipate the usual question, there's no reliable information concerning the fiscalistics of D. W. Griffith's "Birth of a Nation" and as a consequence it is never listed, although trade legend fixes it over $50,000,000, probable.

Perhaps the most necessary case of revision this time is 20th's release in 1960 of "Can-Can," which must be drastically reduced to an estimated $4,200,000. This hard-ticket musical seemed headed for more than twice this figure but just fell apart after the initial runs. The list:

1961: Rentals & Potential

Again, as every year for decades, the Anniversary Edition of VARIETY presents, as an exclusive editorial feature, a roundup of rental revenues for the year just ended. Let it be emphasized that these estimated rentals are confined to the domestic (U.S.-Canada) market only and to releases with a minimum anticipation of $1,000,000. Overseas rentals are not included under either the "Estimate to Date" or the "Anticipation" when playdates have been completed. In recent years the rule-of-thumb has been that overseas is about 50% of total distributor collections.

"Rentals" should be understood to mean the money which accrues to the distributr. Entirely different would be (but not here involved) the total sums taken in via admissions at theatre boxoffices. Typically rentals are a shared (varying) portion of total admissions.

It hardly seems necessary to reiterate that distributor rentals, of which a portion, in turn, flows back to the producer is the barometer of theatrical film health and the essential appeal to future banker or factor participation in production.

The data below refers to 1961 releases. In another exclusive VARIETY compilation, the All-Time Grossers, films which have accumulated $4,000,000 or more in rentals, is re-checked and revised.

Broadway's 'Cheese Club'—Forerunner Of the Modern Celebrity 'Razz' Fests

Nothing Sacred to Uninhibited Bunch of Freeloaders—Everything Went In That Era When It Was a Gayer White Way

By HARRY HERSHFIELD

By living in the past, you cannot be dispossessed. You are both landlord and tenant, in your own storehouse of memories. On one of the walls are photos of George Gershwin, Morrie Ryskind, Edwin Justus Mayer, Marc Connolly, Jack Donahue, Leon Errol, Fiorello La Guardia, Huey Long, Will Rogers and others; and the ears of the wall now unfold the tale of the fabulous and notorious Broadway Cheese Club. The laughs—the lies—the bizarre yarns and plots and plans; of as diversified a group of mental-highbinders as ever scuttled a dais.

Harry Hershfield

One can readily picture its luncheons when the Club's slogans were: "Never knock a brother member till he's gone about an hour." And: "We do not give credit where credit is dues." You couldn't become an officer of the organization, unless you were in arrears.

Never were there so many "freeloaders" in one room—and they in turn, invited others, as their guests. So long as the organization refused to "go over the books," we remained in business. Once, when we were dubbed a "total loss" Marc Connelly cried, "Oh, no—we're not that good!"

And yet, what rich hours they were. With enough highlights to make the Broadway of then one brilliant, and yet, warm glow. The only harsh note in the existence of the Broadway Cheese Club was our continually being forced to fold our tents and move to some other hall, where our dubious reputation hadn't preceded us. In the late '20s, we first huddled in the old Cadillac Hotel. Then to the Hermitage—chased to the basement of "Iceland"—kicked out of the roof, above Lindy's—and pretty sure, our last, was the tolerant Sardi's. We were "persona au gratin." Being the Broadway "Cheese" Club this was truly apt. Where to go and how long we would be allowed to stay was our paramount problem. We always hoped to be like the gypsy who inherited $1,000,000 and immediately opened up 100 empty stores. But like the proverbial British, we "muddled through." There was no common ground for a coherent membership, purpose or performance. The Club actually worked on the theory: "We have absolutely no purpose—and whatever happens to us is velvet."

And what profit. Will Rogers, fooled by the Club's supposed fame, accepted to be the guest of honor. Never have we seen a star so badly "thrown" by a plan. Before he arrived, we decided not to laugh at his drawling quips. But to laugh, if he decided to play his talk "straight." On his first funny crack, came dead silence. His leg, next to mine, buckled. He tried another nifty, with the same result. Then Rogers tried to save himself, by saying: "Well, you boys have heard me so many times, I guess you'd like to hear me in a more serious vein." On his first serious statement, the guests roared with laughter. Again his leg buckled. Finally the immortal Will got the drift of the plot, and then we really had a hilarious afternoon.

Might mention, there were two parts to the luncheon. First half, a free-for-all "ribald" session. Soon as the air was clear, we went into the half honoring the guest of the day. And if he was a tough, "rough-and-tumble" gent such as Mayor Fiorello H. La Guardia, we got some pretty salty rebuttal. This was followed by the "question and answer" period. It was then said of that fighting La Guardia: "He asks you a question—answers it for you, and then says you're wrong!"

Most guests, however, "froze" when it came their turns to speak. Somehow, they were awed by the playwrights, comedians, authors, newspapermen, actors and press-agents that made up the membership—not knowing that most of them were looking for jobs at the time. Even the highly-talented Connelly, down on his luck, asked us if we knew where he could connect. A few days later, we cheered when we got the news that his plays were being accepted and on the way to fame and fortune, climaxed by "Green Pastures." Shortly before this rise, Connelly joined the "Overall Parade" sponsored by this guerilla group of "Cheesers."

'Overall Parade'

With the "Depression" being on, the members in overalls paraded in protest against the high price of clothing. Never was there such national coverage, for a million people watching 39 people parading—the parade led by NTG, yclept Nils T. Granlund, top press-agent, leading an elephant, carrying an actress; and having nothing to do with the cause. Time and place had no special meaning for Granlund, so long as he could get publicity. But he was a good one.

In that gallant band of "overallers" were Rube Goldberg, Tom Oliphant, Morrie Ryskind, George Gershwin, Marc Connelly, Aaron Riche, Harry Reinchenbach (the sharpest of publicity men), Benny Holzman, Frank Hughes, Lawrence Weiner, Al Kayton (the latter representing the then powerful J. P. Muller theatrical advertisers), Julius Colby and many who do slip my memory at this moment. The parade ended with the elephant being stranded on Broadway, Granlund didn't remember the name of the keeper who brought the beast to him. That's just about as coherent as the "Cheesers" functioned.

Walter Winchell, ever alert, joined the group at their affairs, and gleaned many a juicy item. Winchell's plugs of the club kept us in the limelight, making it easy for the "Cheesers" to get the top names in New York as guests of honor. One whom we feted and supported for months was hardly a celebrity. He was "Old Charley," the panhandler, who stopped us on our way to our luncheon, with this pitch: "Gentlemen, I've mislaid my key to my vault, putting me for the moment in financial embarrassment!" Anything for a laugh, we took "Old Charley" to our luncheon, and made the unkempt panhandler the guest of honor, pushing aside the one scheduled. Being Christmas week, the boys, filled with sentiment, got up a purse for Charlie—he walked out after the affair with over $100 and walked right into a Bowery saloon, where he was clipped, then called the police and gave some of our names that he remembered as character witnesses. From then on, we had some time with the bum, finding out later, that he had spent the biggest part of his life in English jails. And worse, we borrowed money from each other to make up his purse—to this day, nobody remembers who owes who—and remember, a few touched the bartender, for the great gesture.

Jolson Gets 'Treatment'

The Broadway Cheese Club was the forerunner for most of the "razzing clubs" since. Al Jolson came to many of the sessions and would always leave with revenge in his heart. A few in the club, including yours truly, were known as "gag snipers"—that is giving the "punchline" before the yarn-spinner could finish. Jolie, who prided himself on being a great storyteller, was never able to finish a gag, to his great chagrin. On oath and count—in 30 tries of gags, at one sitting, Jolson was stopped cold by somebody knowing and spilling the punchline. From then on, Jolson only went into his "song and dance" for the

Tangier Yesterday and Today

By JIMMY CAMPBELL

Tangier.

April 1960 saw the end of Tangier as the free zone of Morocco With it went the money exchange market, smuggling and the greater part of the international business population together with their assets.

A month before the official take-over date all foreign banks closed, personal and business accounts were mostly transferred to Gibraltar, and a vast hord of gold and securities were transported to Switzerland.

The swank Blvd. Pasteur shopping centre became a series of empty stores.

Most of the blame for the change was placed on political pressure by Casablanca big business which was always jealous of Tangier's freedoms.

The year 1961 saw a complete change of picture with a steady influx of a new type of resident, mostly British and American of the let's-get-away-from-it-all order. Its attractions include the climate, some of the finest beaches in the world, modern apartments at cheap rentals, no servant problems, low cost of living compared with the States and Europe, Income Tax escape, whisky, gin and such by the bottle way below Stateside and British prices, the nearness of Gibraltar for money-changing and first class air transport to anywhere.

There are plenty of other facilities here including a modern food market, movie houses, a first class country club for golf, polo and tennis with plenty of fishing and sailing.

There is plenty of night life here, with the gambling casino doing a landoffice business with locals and tourists alike.

For dancing to live music there is the Rif Hotel, the Mayfair club, Cabaret Le Consulat whose floor-show includes strippers, and the Koutoubia Palace which has four European acts together with 10 Oriental dancers, a favorite come-on for tourists.

There are dozens of bars, closing time between 3 and 5 a.m. Several of these are owned by tired American and British businessmen who settled here and got too tired of doing nothing so bought themselves ginmills to keep busy.

One married couple of former saloonkeepers from Brighton, England, took over a police-closed oversexed movie parlor which they now call "Charley's Bar." Englishman Max Farber owns the Mayfair club. Americans, Jay Hazlewood and Frank Mascarelli, both have popular drinking palaces; the former owns Jays Parade Bar and the latter the Bar Liaison.

Music is supplied in most saloons via live piano or disks. This year has brought a big tourist boom, mostly British, who come on a two-week basis, a travel agency package deal which includes air transport and hotel.

The principle beef is too many touts and beggars and that everything is too expensive. The probable truth is that some travel agent employees hook them into all kinds of side trips, cash down, the minute they get here and before they get the tipoff from tourists already here. There is plenty of profit in this side-trip money, to say nothing of the backhanders from saloons and other night spots where the tourist is so guided.

Residents agree that bar prices are way out of line with wholesale prices and the average tavern owner's overhead.

According to the influential Travel Trade Gazette, considered the "bible" of British travel agents, the demand for Tangier holidays for 1962 is way off. This view is confirmed by British European Airways and Britain's leading travel agents.

It is doubtful if all this will effect the yearly visit of Barbara Hutton or the tired business men and their families who come here to get away from it all.

Glum Prospects For German Pix

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin.

Of the different branches of German amusements, the film industry is still in a poor position. It's probably the branch that's worst off — especially financially. There has been a certain upbeat in foreign profits last year, but within its homegrounds, the business went further down in 1961. According to SPIO, the top organization of the W-German film industry, attendance registered a total of 93,300,000 in last year's first half in 48 W-German key cities, that's a decline of 12% if compared with the same period in the year before (1960).

A reason for the dip in business is, of course, the advance of television. Also the five-day week, which gives people the opportunity to spend weekends away from their home. Add new strong foreign product competition.

Result has been fewer films. While in previous years the annual output went as high as 130, the year of 1960 saw only the making of just about 100 films, while 1961 saw further decline. The downward trend will continue. This, consequently, goes for the box-office too. While the German share at the domestic b.o. still amounted to 47.7% in 1958, it was down to 41% in 1960.

"Why is the German film so bad?" is often heard, both in and outside the country. Berlin film critic Karl-Heinz Krueger wrote recently in Der Abend: "The question is wrongly put—it should be: Why is the German film getting worse and worse?" The critic opines that the German film is sick, both artistically and economically. He writes: "The unbearable arrogance of many German filmites, combined with the stupid operetta pomp of offical events, has scared off the few intellectuals who could have contributed their creative strength to the German film."

"The unholy situation is partly the German film's own fault," according to Helmut Kaeutner, one of this country's top directors. Kaeutner is not too unhappy about television. "Competition forces us to turn out better films. It is always good."

More Coffee, Brandy & Cigars

By HERMAN G. WEINBERG

In Marlene Dietrich's A.B.C., a "philosophical dictionary" patterned after those of Ambrose Bierce and Voltaire, she says, "Whatever aging people say to the contrary, we all regret our youth once we have lost it." Another actress, Sarah Bernhardt, once put it another way when in her later years an old admirer came to visit her in her apartment high over Paris. Climbing all the stairs he asked her breathlessly, "Why do you live so high up?" To which she answered, "Dear friend, it's the only way I can still make the hearts of men beat faster."

Again, Wilde Said It First

In the French film, "Life Begins Tomorrow," Jean-Pierre Aumont says to Andre Gide, "May I ask you an indiscreet question?" To which Gide replies, "There are no indiscreet questions, there are only indiscreet answers." Very nice, only Oscar Wilde said it first. (Apropos Wilde, the idea of "Odorama" was presaged by him in his original stage directions for "Salome" which indicated "Braziers of perfume should take the place of an orchestra—a new perfume for each emotion.")

Precedentials

The "Marriage" sequence by Rene Clair in "The Frenchwoman and Love" was antedated by a short story, "Here We Are," by Dorothy Parker a generation ago (1931 to be exact). And the climactic scene of "The Virgin Spring" (the miraculous appearance of a spring on a site where virtue is crushed by violence, as a sign of divine recognition of the incident) was first used by, of all people, Douglas Fairbanks in "The Gaucho" over 30 years ago.

The highly-touted Carnival in Rio scenes of Black Orpheus were not only antedated but far surpassed by those shot by Orson Welles for his unreleased film for Howard Hughes, "It's All True."

Grigori Kotzinstov in the Soviet "Don Quixote" shows a little naked boy in a peaked sombrero running up a road between two men conversing, for no special reason save that it made for a charming touch. It would have been more charming if it did not recall its original use (far more enchantingly) by Sergei Eisenstein in that portion of his unfinished "Que Viva Mexico!" salvaged by Marie Seton in "Time in the Sun" where he had an adorable shot of half a dozen little naked boys, all in peaked sombreros, running up a flight of street steps like a flock of birds suddenly taking off.

Jean-Luc Godard's "Breathless" has an exchange of dialogue: "You ought'a to wear silk socks with tweeds." "No? I like the feel of silk." "Then lay off tweeds." You will find it in Dashiell Hammett's "The Glass Key," written very much earlier.

The entire jewel robbery sequence in "Rififi" was outlined in the novel "Alexanderplatz, Berlin," by Alfred Doblin, published in 1929.

Von Stroheim and Zinnemann

In 1927, Erich von Stroheim wanted to release his Viennese epic, "The Wedding March," in two parts. It was denied him as being "uneconomic." Today, Fred Zinnemann, wanting to do the same thing with his Hawaiian epic, "Hawaii," from the vast Michener book, finds himself against the same impasse and for the same reason. (George Stevens justified the three-hour lengths of "Giant" and "The Diary of Anne Frank" by saying, "I believe in giving audiences something for their money. Then they'll tell their friends." Stroheim used the same argument in 1923-24 for his masterwork, "Greed," and was called "crazy.")

The Sado-Masochistic Update

Afficionados of "Ben-Hur," new version, ought to see the old version by Fred Niblo with Ramon Novarro and Francis X. Bushman. No miniatures were used in the sea battles as in the current one, nor did it resort to the trickery of painted-glass "sets" as this one does. Nor have they been able to improve on the chariot race of the first one. They did leave out all the sex of the original version, however, and substituted for it brutality. O tempora, etc.!

If you have seen "Crack in the Mirror" with Orson Welles and Juliette Greco, read Somerset Maugham's story, "A Woman of 50," and be surprised. And for that matter, with memories of Ingmar Bergman's "The Magician," if you still have them, recall or try to see again at some film society, Lewis' "Cat and the Canary" and see how it was all done before and with better ambiance too.)

Even so original a director as Chaplin couldn't always be 100% original as witness his wild party scene in "A Woman of Paris" (1921) where a girl is unpeeled of the drapery in which she is swathed till she is left nude. The same incident occurred in the late Paul Claudel's scenario for his ballet, "L'Homme et Son Desir" (music by Darius Milhaud) written in 1917. (Not to mention Chaplin's reworking of the conveyor-belt scene in Rene Clair's "A Nous la Liberte" for his "Modern Times" and the lottery-ticket chase into football scrimmage of Clair's "Le Million" for the "chicken-football" also in "Modern Times." But as Rene Clair said, he owed so much to Chaplin that he was flattered.)

Re Human Steeds

In one of "La Dolce Vita's" orgy scenes, Marcello Mastroianni is shown riding a girl on all fours on the floor, a reductio ad absurdum of Von Stroheim's drunken officers, also on all fours on the floor, being "ridden" by girls cracking whips in the bordello scene of his "Wedding March" 35 years ago. And Mastroianni flinging feathers from a pillow in the same scene was merely echoing what Roy D'Arcy and his drunken companions did in a wild party scene in Stroheim's "Merry Widow" in 1925. (Only Stroheim turned it into a quasi-poetic thing by having his debauchees fling the feathers out of the windows so that the street below looked in the gray dawn of the next day as if it had been snowing. Where, indeed, are the snows of yesteryear?)

Lawford's Reach-Back

And, before we leave the subject of remakes, shouldn't we mention that even the "granddaddy" of all films, "The Great Train Robbery," made by Edwin Porter one-reels around the turn of the century, has been announced for "remake" as a starring vehicle for Peter Lawford? With this one, the movies will surely come to a complete cycle.

After three screen versions of "Rain" (Phyllis Haver, Gloria Swanson and Joan Crawford in which no spoken reference was made about the weather, it being taken for granted, comes a fourth, with Rita Hayworth, in which a soldier says to Sadie Thompson, "Let's go before it starts to rain"—the understatement of our time.

For the Record

There were two "Potemkins" before Eisenstein's (in France and England), a "Greed" (called McTeague with Fania Marinoff and Holbrook Blinn) before Stroheim's, and even an "Intolerance" before Griffith's—by Georges Melies in Paris, "La Civilization a Travers les Ages."

And, if only for the record, Murnau's "The Last Laugh" (1925) was not the first silent film which had no subtitles, as is generally supposed. Alex Tairov's "Death," from a novel by Camille Lemon-

Dutch Production Stays 'Occasional'

By HANS SAALTINK

Amsterdam.

Economically it is not possible to produce more than three Dutch feature films annually, each of which can lose 250,000 Dutch guilders (+$70,000), about half the cost of production. This loss is covered by a Production Fund, set up by the Dutch Cinema League and the government.

In 1961, however, only one film was released while another one was in production. "The Knife," directed by Fons Rademakers was a success with the critics, but got a cold eye when shown at the Cannes Film Festival, even when there was praise for the delicate handling of its subject matter: the maturing of a boy. Later, "The Knife" was sent to the Edinburgh Film Festival in Scotland and was bought for release in Britain, thank to favorable reviews.

Another film of Fons Rademakers, "Fellers, Stop That Noise," tragi-comedy around the Dutch Santa Claus festivities, was shown at the Berlin Film Festival Dutch documentary, "The Low Countries" by George Sluizer, was awarded a Silver Bear at Berlin. Rademakers' directional debut "Village On The River" was released in Austria and got rave reviews.

In 1962 several films will be produced. Bert Haanstra is preparing his third feature film (after "Fanfare" and "The Case M.P."), a semi-documentary of the break-in into a German occupied prison where political prisoners are kept in custody. In March a new team starts on "Koen," another film on the problems of adolescence. Koes Brusse, like Rademakers actor-turned-director, has finished his debut, "Fair In The Rain," now awaiting release.

Among documentarists, Charles Huguenot van der Linden, director of "Dutch in Seven Lessons" (film debut of Audrey Hepburn) and "Interlude By Candlelight," has finished a 29 minute short, in wide-screen, "Big City Blues," which will be Dutch contribution to one of the European film festivals in 1962.

An old Dutch film, produced in the late 1930s, "Pygmalion," proved a hit when re-released, due to the interest in and success of the Dutch stage production of "My Fair Lady," "Pygmalion" was directed in Holland by Ludwig Berger with consent of Shaw, provided the film would not be shown outside of Holland where it would clash with the English version made about the same time.

A unit of 20th-Fox came to Holland to film exteriors for "The Inspector," adapted from Jan de Hartog's novel. At the same time U.I. was busy shooting in Surinam on "The Spiral Road," another De Hartog insured film. Jan de Hartog, Holland's most known novelist and playwright, has never been popular with the Dutch critics, writes in English and only then gets translated and published into Dutch. In 1939 he wrote a film script, "Somewhere In Holland," in which he also appeared, but the film never got a wide release as its premiere nearly coincided with the occupation of Holland by the Germans.

'If It's a Paramount Picture, It's The Best Show in Town'—A Zukor Truism In the Heyday of Pioneer's Career

Hollywood.

Twentyfive years ago the top b.o. names were Shirley Temple, Gary Cooper, Clark Gable, Astaire-Rogers, Charles Chaplin, Greta Garbo, Marlene Dietrich, Grace Moore, Laurel & Hardy and Robert Taylor. Except in the cases of Miss Moore and Messrs. Cooper, Gable and Hardy, all of whom have died, and Garbo and Chaplin who seem to have retired, the others are showing a durability that previously had only been associated with tungsten.

Though Laurel is not appearing in person he is working on a tv series of Larry Harmon's new product. Shirley Temple, top favorite around the world a generation ago, seems to be taking it easy this season, but she's had plenty of prime time tv exposure in the last three years, and while by no means the actress it looked that she might develop into when she was the child-wonder, she has replaced some of that brash showmanship with new grace and charm.

Some of the names which were not among the Top 10 in 1937 but were pretty close to it, are still in there pitching, such as James Cagney, Charles Laughton, Joan Crawford, Fredric March, Irene Dunne, Dick Powell, Jack Benny, Martha Raye and Fred MacMurray.

In that year Adolph Zukor celebrated his 25th anniversary as a producer of motion pictures, for it was in 1912 that he paid $35,000 to bring "Queen Elizabeth" to the screen with Sarah Bernhardt as his star.

Another of the big ones in those early days was "The Squaw Man." The old Zukor-Lasky-DeMille combo made this one in the Lasky barn which later became NBC's studio at the corner of Sunset & Vine, Hollywood.

The first actor to star in a Zukor picture was James O'Neill, father of Eugene O'Neill and he did it in the "Count of Monte Cristo." Zukor even lured Minnie Maddern Fiske to play "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," and topped that by signing the fiery Metropolitan opera star, Geraldine Farrar, in "Carmen." He also presented Mary Pickford in "A Good Little Devil," a play she had done previously on Broadway for David Belasco.

'Affairs of Anatol'—1961 Model

Zukor called his outfit Famous Players, and they certainly were. As early as 1919 a combination of Zukor, Lasky, Goldwyn and DeMille rolled into dough with Thomas Meighan and Lon Chaney in "The Miracle Man." That was the year also that DeMille starred Gloria Swanson in a Sir James M. Barrie play which Barrie called "The Admirable Crichton" but which DeMille thought would sell better as "Male and Female." And if you want to know how long it takes a show to reach Broadway, the Schwartz-Dietz musical now on Broadway was played in 1921 as a Zukor picture starring Wallace Reid.

By 1926—the Jazz Age—Zukor was starring Rudolph Valentino in "The Sheik," though Paramount's best picture in that era was the daddy of all great westerns, Emerson Hough's "The Covered Wagon." That was the year, incidentally that DeMille first made "The 10 Commandments," a picture he was to do much better with on the second time out 30 years later.

Cooper All Over The Lot

In the midst of the bear market in 1927 Zukor spliced Marlene Dietrich and Gary Cooper in a bauble of sand-dune escapology called "Morocco" and another one called "Beau Geste." He had previously given Cooper his first starring vehicle, Owen Wister's "The Virginian." Zukor also brigaded Cooper with Clara Bow in "Wings" which went SRO from coast to coast. By now Zukor was accepted around the world as a vestpocket wonder.

He survived the great bull market and collapse of the economy in 1929 and by 1935 was unreeling such smashеroos as "The Smiling Lieutenant" starring the still smiling Maurice Chevalier and Claudette Colbert. He had two more for Cooper, one with Franchot Tone called "The Lives of a Bengal Lancer," a motion picture which was all motion, and another with Helen Hayes, Hemingway's "A Farewell To Arms," a picture which certainly was not improved in a recent remake.

Fred MacMurray and Sylvia Sidney came out in a Zukor presentation in Technicolor that year. That was Henry Hathaway's version of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine."

Where Laughton's Spiels Began

But the best picture of them all, or at least the best performance of them all of that era, was Charles Laughton as the butler in "Ruggles of Red Gap," the Harry Leon Wilson comedy which gave Laughton the chance to recite the Gettysburg Address and steal the picture, a recitative talent which was to take him far in cultural fields for years afterwards.

"The Big Broadcast of 1937," which was to celebrate Adolph Zukor's silver jubilee in motion pictures, exposed no blockbusters, but it did give Jack Benny, George Burns & Gracie Allen a chance to see how good they could be in pictures. The year before, Par under the Zukor banner, released Martha Raye, Bob Burns and Bing Crosby in "Rhythm on the the Range" and a great picture starring Gladys George called "Valiant Is the Word for Carrie."

Thanks For The Memory

Of that Zukor era Jack Benny, George Burns, Martha Raye, Jean Arthur, Fred MacMurray, Claudette Colbert, Bing Crosby, Irene Dunne, Shirley Ross, Randolph Scott, Dorothy Lamour, Bonita Granville, Charles Bickford, George Raft and Henry Wilcoxon are still very much around, and, though he didn't get much billing in those days, so is Bob Hope. About the first of his emcee bits was performed after the review at the Cocoanut Grove and left him as the best remembered name on the Par lot.

Of course a lot of one's success is being born at the right time in history. Zukor was born in Riese, Hungary, in 1873. He came to this country as an immigrant at 16 and like many of the early picture producers worked with furs long before he could afford to order them for a picture production. At the turn of the century he joined Marcus Loew, another furrier, in a penny-arcade venture. He was treasurer of Loew Enterprises until 1912 when he decided to form his Famous Players and won the good offices of Daniel Frohman, a legit producer who liked the quality Zukor was trying to inject in motion pictures.

Led With A Queen

That "Queen Elizabeth" thing starring Sarah Bernhardt was Zukor's first effort. He followed it with James K. Hackett in "The Prisoner of Zenda." Both did all right. In 1916 Zukor's Famous Players and Jesse Lasky Feature Play Co. combined under the name of Famous Players-Lasky Corp., one of the most glamorous billings of the whole glamorous biz.

With Paramount as their releasing corporation, some of the most famous stars of all time were guided to their subsequent eminence by Adolph Zukor.

First On Wall Street

The stock of Zukor's company was the first to be traded on the N.Y. Stock Exchange and in all the name-changing until it got down to Paramount Pictures, Adolph Zukor always stayed up there on top. He is a rare combination of a good business man with an artistic sense of what was quality and would still sell.

A small man, he has great dignity and certainly proved in his time that if it were a Paramount picture it was the best show in town.

Unions' Fears Allayed, British Film Industry Now Going 'International'

By HAROLD MYERS

London.

Internationalism is in the air. The motion picture industry in Britain will be taking giant strides in 1962 to achieve this objective. At the top of the agenda is the Anglo-French coproduction treaty which has been in the hopper for several years, but at long last is seeing the light of day. That will be the forerunner of a further agreement to be negotiated in the coming months with Italy and possibly other European film producing nations. It will represent a major advance for British producers in the European sphere and could have tremendous economic, cultural and political advantages.

On a strictly dollars analysis, such strides will enable filmmakers in London to get the best of both possible worlds. Firstly, the pictures that ensue will rank as British quota and will get their due share of the statutory Eady levy. Furthermore, they will also qualify for quotas and film aid in France, Italy and elsewhere. So, right away, they are sharing the load and have an obvious entree on either side of the channel, without loss of national benefits. Also on the positive side, it will give British performers the welcome opportunity of a wider audience in Europe, and Continental artists an equal chance of attracting a bigger public in Britain.

Two 'Home' Markets

On the face of it, nothing could be more sensible. Film production is, and will continue to be, a speculative business and, except in rare cases, calls for maximum dependence on home market earnings to keep out of the red. With coproduction there would technically be two home markets and the breakeven and profit chances would be that much greater.

Yet it has taken several years to come to terms, mainly because of the ultra-cautious attitude of the unions, both here and on the continent of Europe. Their concern is understandable, though many producers consider they invent dangers. The main intention of the unions, of course, is to protect the interests of their members and the British fear that a spate of coproductions filmed outside this country could limit hiring in British studios. All their resistance has been based on this premise, and they are not easily to be convinced that in the long run coproduction can only be of universal advantage.

Now comes a new twist. Just a few months back the British Government stated its intention of seeking admission to the European Common Market, and the unions, once more stepped in to urge caution. According to their interpretation of the Rome Treaty, the admission of Britain into the E.C.M. could well nullify all the protective legislation that has succoured the British film industry for many years past. It could, they argue, mean the end of the screen quota, which guarantees minimum playing time for British films. It could mean the end of the statutory levy, which gives a bonus to British films based on their earnings in the British market; and, most important of all, it could mean the end of the National Film Finance Corp., the Government bank which has enabled many independent producers to go on the floor with projects that might otherwise have been abandoned.

Rome Treaty

Interpretation of the relevant clauses in the Rome Treaty has been the subject of considerable argy-bargy between the unions and producers during the past few weeks and neither side has succeeded in convincing the other. For the time being, the matter rests until the E.C.M. countries have had time to consider the British application and all that it involves. But if the U.K. becomes a part of the European economy, the British film industry could be profoundly affected. For one thing, it would lead almost immediately to the ending of all restrictions from Europe for the importation of British films and, in countries like Germany, France and Italy, this could be a matter of major importance.

It is obviously going to take several months before all the issues involved come to be resolved, but there is little doubt that the Government initiative in this matter heralds the end of an insular attitude towards industry and commerce in general, and motion pictures automatically are part—albeit a small one—of the bargain.

As can be seen from the foregoing, the unions are concerned at the international trend in British films. It is, therefore, particularly interesting to record that one of the unions, the Association of Cinematograph and Television Technicians, has taken the initiative in campaigning for a British film festival. If producers and distributors from all parts of the world can 'forgather in Cannes, Berlin, San Sebastian, Venice, et al, ACTT sees no reason why they should not do likewise in Britain. The initiative came from their own producers and directors and now the union has thrown the ball to the producers and the Government, urging their support and co-operation.

Although strong arguments can be advanced for a British festival, such a maneuver could be an embarrassment to Arthur Watkins, who is not only president of the British Film Producers Assn., but is also proxy of the International Federation of Film Producers. In his latter capacity he has been agitating in a forthright way for limitation of festivals on the reasonable grounds that too many place an undue strain on the industry generally, its product and its personnel. Within the coming weeks he will have to speak for his own organization, as well as for the International Federation, on this project.

Aspects

All these international developments have come at a time when the industry is showing the first signs of stability since the peak days of 1948. Attendances are still on the downward glide, but the rate of decline is substantially smaller than in the past years and there is every hope that attendances will level off at around 500,000,000 a year within the forseeable future. That total may compare most unfavorably with the peak 1,400,000,000 a year, but the industry has long since become reconciled to these new harsh facts of life.

The constant decline in paid admissions and the reduction in the volume of production, notably from Hollywood, have combined to upset the traditional booking pattern in Britain. It is virtually true to suggest that for the first time for many many years, there are only two national outlets of any significance. If a producer fails to get release either on the Chicago.

With the fear of television competition considerably allayed by time, the supply of money available for picture house construction here has loosened. It's happened just at a time when the largest and most affluent group of picture goers has settled in the suburbs, and the result is the first upsurge in theatre construction in over a quarter of a century and all in the outlying areas. The current scoreboard shows seven hardtops planned or under construction in the suburbs and at least a half-dozen drive-ins.

Stanford Kohlberg, owner of a string of ozoners around Chicago, has selected only shopping centre sites for four new hardtops in the suburbs, all of which are expected to be completed within the next twelve months. "There's no doubt that the money men were waiting for teevee to level out before they invested in the hardtops," Kohlberg opines. "This has not been quite so true of drive-ins, since they've continued to increase steadily." He also said that he was looking for spots for a half-dozen new ozoners.

The exodus to the suburbs is indicated by the 1950-60 census statistics which show that in the past decade the Windy City popu-

...And I Quote:

By HAL KANTER

Hollywood.

You work with the right people in this business and you're bound to hear things worth repeating.

When, some years ago, it was my privilege to collaborate with the late John P. Medbury on the old Amos 'n' Andy radio series, I was astonished at the great amount of humor John tossed away in the course of a day. I remember one afternoon when we broke for lunch and, entering a Beverly Hills restaurant, were asked by the hostess, "May I show you a table?"

"You may this time," John replied fiercely, "but never again!"

While John was one of the wittiest men I ever knew, he once asserted his favorite wit had been Wilson Mizner. Monte Brice, a raconteur and aide-de-Bob Hope's camp, would seem to agree with John's estimation.

Years ago, Medbury and Mizner were standing on a New York street corner watching a lady of the evening prowl her beat, swinging her pocketbook as she churned her lips in front of the two men. At length, Mizner observed aloud: "That poor girl has worked up enough lather to shave every man in Kansas City."

Monte recalled Mizner's recital of a conversation with a young man who had approached him with a request that he be introduced to some of Mizner's shadier friends. The boy wanted to learn how to be a pickpocket! "And," Mizner added, "this kid was so nervous he couldn't dip his hand in the Hudson River without tipping the Palisades!"

In California, Medbury made his debut as a radio comedian, reading his own lines into a Hollywood microphone. He emerged from the studio after his initial broadcast and encountered Mizner on Vine Street.

"Johnny," the adventurer said, "I just heard you on the air."

"What'd you think?" John asked eagerly.

"If you don't get off it," Mizner replied, "I'm going to stop breathing it."

Medbury once quoted Mizner's description of a painfully thin and sickly mutual friend: "The man is a trellis for varicose veins."

Unhappily, I never knew Wilson Mizner. But, happily, I do have an entente cordiale with Ed Wynn and he, too, knew the fabulous Wilson. Ed once described an evening when a blind date had been arranged for Mizner, who was down on his luck at the time, a not unusual circumstance. The date was with a wealthy widow and he was to be presented to the lady in a fashionable New York restaurant.

When the widow arrived, Mizner was appalled at the enormous size of her outrageously blue-veined nose. Because of her wealth, however, he was determined to be as gallant as possible. But his sense of humor put a ceiling on the possibility. Upon introduction, Mizner took her hand in his, gazed soulfully into her nose and asked in his reedy voice: "Madame, do you smell anything dead?"

The puzzled widow sniffed the air without delicacy and said no, she didn't smell anything dead.

"Ah, then!" Mizner exclaimed. "Then there cannot be anything dead for miles around!" He bent low to kiss the widow's hand but she had taken it with her as she swept indignantly from the premises.

Ed Wynn

One of the reasons I treasure my relationship with Ed Wynn is that his own conversation is invariably amusing. He is never dull; the magnificent comedy he has showered on American audiences "longer than Campbell's has been in the soup business", is a reflection and extension of his personal sense of humor. He sees fun everywhere and has arisen more than once from the floor of personal tragedy to deliver his gift of laughter.

We were walking to the theatre one afternoon a decade ago when Ed ran into a friend he hadn't seen in years. "Ed Wynn!" the oldtimer said warmly. "Good Lord, man it's wonderful to see you! You haven't changed a bit in 30 years!"

Ed turned to me and with a sigh remarked, "I must've been the oldest looking 35-year-old you ever saw!"

Another gentleman whose conversations I enjoy is not in the theatre; he is the now-retired publisher of Classics Illustrated magazine but whose energy and humor have projected him into a variety of commercial, civic and charitable activities that keep him in constant orbit around the world. His name is Albert L. Kanter and he is, I suspect, a frustrated actor—a theory which will doubtless bring a storm of paternal wrath on my head. Yet I support my contention by testifying that I have never known him to shirk an assignment as a toastmaster or after-dinner speaker. In fact, meals at his home are frequently accompanied by some brilliant during-dinner speaking.

At a recent family gathering, my father remarked that when he was a baby his mother hired a girl to wheel him about in his buggy. "And ever since," he said, "women have been pushing me for money."

Returning from a business trip that took him around the globe, Dad remarked last year, "The world is shrinking, son. Go see it before it disappears."

He summed up the town of London with the observation, "If they ever scrape the bird-droppings off their buildings, the British Empire will collapse."

When my parents lived in Tudor City, a few minutes walk from the United Nations headquarters, Mother sat reading the newspapers one evening and expressed her disturbance at reports of international crisis. She wondered aloud what we, as private citizens, could do to help ease world tension. Dad looked up from his sports page and suggested, "Well, Honey, you might start by running over to the UN and cleaning the windows."

"Marriage," Dad once confided to his children, "is the second thing I had in mind when I met your mother."

Mother long ago learned to defend herself in conversations with Dad.

Describing a trip to Europe one spring, Dad said they took along five pieces of luggage: "A valise for me, three for your mother and her 100-pound box of pills."

"You weigh closer to 200-pounds," Mom shot back. He retreated behind the sports page.

German actress Lilian Harvey, who made many films in America and had a lengthy career with UFA, is hitting the comeback trail.

She has opened at the Zimmer Theatre in Heidelberg, for a month's run as the lead in the Terrence Rattigan comedy, "Olivia." Her co-star is Heinz Plate.

Siegel Exits As MGM Prod. Chief

Sol C. Siegel, vicepresident in charge of production at Metro since 1958, is giving up the reins as studio head but will continue his association with MGM as an independent producer. He'll continue as boss in Culver City until pictures now in the completion stages are fully wrapped up and then will devote his time exclusively to personal productions for MGM.

Siegel requested the shift in status, and Metro president Joseph R. Vogel acquiesced, according to the official word from within. It was under Siegel's Coast regime that MGM turned the filmmaking corner to healthy profits. No disharmony has been hinted between him and, in the east, Vogel and the board.

The move at first glance looked similar to the Darryl F. Zanuck relinquishment of the production chieftain's post at 20th-Fox to go inside. As Siegel put it, he wants more of a "creative" position. Also, there are possible capital gains considerations. Vogel talked in terms of Metro's "finest inventory" under Siegel.

As to a successor, speculation was running high at VARIETY's early presstime this week. Vogel and Benjamin Thau, latter the longtime Culver City senior citizen, were both at the studio but incommunicado.

It's inferred in some quarters that Siegel will stay on perhaps until next May, with important MGM completion projects including "Mutiny on the Bounty," "How the West Was Won" and "Wonderful World of Brothers Grimm."

While a next modus operandi blueprint has yet to be drawn, some reports have it that Vogel intends to spend more time at the studio in an overseeing capacity. Going hand in hand with this is the obvious fact that MGM hardly needs a production head in the traditional sense in view of the preponderance of indie-partnership theatrical operations. In the east, last month's appointment of Robert H. O'Brien as exec v.p. indicates more administrative work will be taken over by O'Brien, who continues as treasurer, and this will free Vogel for more time in the west.

Preliminary reports have it that Robert M. Weitman, MGM's television production head, has had talks with Vogel about a theatrical feature "coordinator" role but with no conclusions as yet.

David Merrick, 373 E. 148, Extols Taubman & Kerr

By HOBE MORRISON

The New York drama critics are the most brilliant group of journalists in the world. That is the conviction of David Merrick.

"Howard Taubman, of the Times, is one of the few great theatre reviewers of the last 50 years, one of the best of our time," he says. "He lends lustre to this or any other city."

"Walter Kerr, of the Herald Tribune? What a critic! What a reviewer! What an inspired aisle-sitter! If you want to be entertained and instructed, read his notices. They are a triumph."

Those and other superlatives were gushed by Merrick in an exclusive interview with VARIETY. At least the interview was with a man who said his name is David Merrick. The speaker, a printer at VARIETY's press plant, was noncommittal about whether he's the Broadway producer who last week took a full-page ad in the Herald Trib to plug his musical, "Subways Are for Sleeping."

"What do you mean, 'Am I the David Merrick?'" he demanded. "It's a bleak January day and things are pretty quiet. Can't you take a joke?" he concluded, turning back to his linotype machine.

Press Reaction

One thing is certain, the producer got a lavish amount of newspaper space, even for such a master space-getter as he is, for the comparatively modest cost of about $600 for the one-edition insertion in the single publication. Even his habitually jealous rival producers expressed amusement and admiration for his feat.

REFLECTIONS ON SUCCESS AND FAILURE

By REV. MALCOLM BOYD

(Mal Boyd, onetime partner of Mary Pickford and Buddy Rogers, holder of several important executive posts in show business before taking Holy Orders has shown himself a modern theologian, not always with the encouragement of his bishop. He is now Episcopal Chaplain at Wayne State University at Detroit. His thoughtful articles have often appeared in these Anniversary Editions.—Ed)

Detroit.

What does it mean to commit the sin of Failure? When our society was more sharply marked by inner-directedness it meant the failure to exceed others in the race for riches and status. Now, in a society oriented to other-directedness (the desert is in the heart of one's peer group, one might paraphrase Eliot by Riesman) the sin of Failure is non-conformity issuing in non-acceptance. Ironically, one may now be able to afford a Rolls Royce and yet be conformist-smart enough to respect one's peer group by driving a lesser car.

Of course, one may be avant-garde within an avant-garde peer group and show up under the porte-cochere of one of those clubs shown in the old Cadillac ads driving even a Volkswagen. I recall standing beneath the porte-cochere of the elegant Beverly Hills Hotel in company with a woman magazine editor who commanded the attendant to fetch her car. "It's the tomahto-colored Jag-yoo-ar," she dropped. She may have committed scores of other sins that day but she was not guilty of the sin of Failure. And everybody knew it; and that was precisely a part of her sinfulness. For, unless the world knows that one is not guilty of the sin of Failure, is not one guilty of it?

The absolution of Success is found prominently throughout the Western world which reflects, in varying degrees, the Religion of the American Way of Life. One genuflects to West Berlin's Kurfurstendamm, one sprinkles oneself with secular holy water on Manhattan's Fifth Avenue or Chicago's Michigan Boulevard or atop San Francisco's Nob Hill, one kneels for the blessing of Success on the Via Veneto and the Champs-Elysees.

Playing It 'Smooth'

This is conformity. To what is one conforming? To the way things are done and to the security and safety found within that womb. To accepted social standards which do not jar or shock or change or seek to change. To the serenity of tranquilized non-involvement in genuine social sin (racism is perhaps the paramount contemporary exhibit). To doing just the right thing, and avoiding the wrong thing, to saying just the right thing, and avoiding saying the wrong thing, to following just the right course and avoiding the wrong course. Who is the arbiter? One's peer group, and this may be translated into regional, national, religious and various social levels.

In the cult of success one is not permitted a failure. A creative person is going to have his creative output measured in stark black-or-white; he is a success or a failure, and any meandering he does amid the vistas of development and creative growth is suspect and, in fact, outside the ken of conformity. Any such meandering is calculated to drive his public relations counsellors mad for they are hourly drilled by their peculiarly demanding gods to recite, "I am a success, you are a success, he is a success, she is a success, it is a success, we are a success, you are a success, they are a success. I am a success, you are a success . . ."

Shaw's Counsel

This seems to be in sharp contradiction of some sage advice handed down to all young creative persons by that master, George Bernard Shaw. He noted in Advice to A Young Critic: "You say you are scarcely competent to write books just yet. That is why I recommend you to learn. If I advised you to learn to skate, you would not reply that your balance was scarcely good enough yet. A man learns to skate by staggering about making a fool of himself. Indeed he progresses in all things by resolutely making a fool of himself." To make a fool of oneself, one must not be tied down to the droll categories of success or failure. Yet, in our society, a writer is a success or failure as is a society matron or a truck driver or an actress or a decorator. Yes, each person is also to be measured as a success or failure as a person (outside of profession, occupation or vocation), but this summing-up, too, will be somewhat flat and surface. It will be predicated on related external factors. A major criterion will be conformity.

Deviates from cultural conformity are raised up by the insistent and repressive demands of a heightened conformity itself. One wonders with sadness what deviations—socially, artistically, sexually—must without fail develop out of the bland but iron pattern of togetherness being inculcated with such commercial tenderness upon our guild-ridden puritanism.

'The Disenchanted'

The most unforgivable social sin is that of Failure, yet, as Manley Halliday remarks in "The Disenchanted": "nothing fails like success." We can only make sense of this paradox by comprehending our ideology of success. The pressure, the life-or-death pressure, is to succeed. Engaged in the common pursuit to succeed, we have all come to a common (yet largely unarticulated) awareness of the inevitability of some kind of failure as a price to be paid.

The poignant sameness of our human condition, in our peculiar contemporary mold, was the common denominator in our response to Arthur Miller's "The Death of a Salesman." Within the confines of the darkened theatre, everyone could, quite honestly, if only for a searing moment, identify with the predicament of the protagonist in the play. Gripped by the compulsion to succeed, it is inevitable that we should experience common failure. Why? Because the earmark of our success is recognition which is inevitably withheld pending the payment of a price, at one level or another.

Shackled

The absolution of Success affords neither release nor joy. It does not bring peace to the troubled conscience; it signally fails to lead one into newness of life. Instead, this secular absolution tightens the shackles (there are always new and richer and more powerful Joneses to keep up with), it compounds already labyrinthal guilt complexes, it succeeds in perpetuating the profound occasion of failure when one tragically sold out to conformity for a price.

When will we learn how to fail—honestly, without guilt, with the realism of learning what success means? Any meaningful success grows out of many failures. One is not saying that we need more failure to counteract the mania for success. It is perfectly proper and understandable that people ought to want to succeed. But what does it mean to succeed? There are many apparent success stories in our folklore and newspapers which are rank failures. Why? Because the price paid for apparent success has destroyed the possibility of genuinely valid success.

Not Truly Failure

Too, there are many apparent sad stories of failure which, if seen in a broader perspective or in the right context, are great success stories. Why? Because initial failure listed (or will issue) in eventual success. In politics, science, the arts, letters, religion, education and social work, some persons have to believe deeply and strongly enough in certain objectives to accept being hit in the face by ridicule, hatred, loss of security, destruction of prestige—even temporarily to be driven out of active participation in their profession—in the struggle to preserve the integrity of certain objectives, ideals or values. If our culture is to be virile and open to continued creative growth, some persons will have to go on paying the highest price in gambling that they are right. Of course, if one believes passionately enough in his cause, if he knows that he is right and will stake his life on his knowledge, does he even feel that he is gambling?

There are times when an individual must stand outside of—isolated from—his peer-group, left to judge solely by himself whether he is a success or a failure. There are countless stories of posthumous recognition of success which had previously been seen as despicable failure. Yet, so often, such belated recognition of success is also recognition of the existence of a hitherto rejected value or despised cause.

Our present society has made Failure into a mortal sin. Now it needs to see the heightened reality which may be brought into focus by making a deliberately blurred, out-of-focus picture of merely flat reality. If it can succeed in doing this, and comprehend the possibility of salvation in failure, it will have rooted out a malignancy of national and cultural pharisaism. "I dont like people who have never fallen or stumbled. Their virtue is lifeless and of little value. Life hasn't revealed its beauty to them," Dr. Zhivago exclaims. One wishes that Dr. Zhivago had instead exclaimed, "I don't like people who have never accepted the fact that they have fallen or stumbled." No one has escaped from falling or stumbling but so many have refused to admit it to themselves and to others! So many have refused to accept their failures. Then how can they hope to 'succeed'?

If is out of an honest acceptance of failure that growth, maturity, progress may ensue. Evgraf (in Boris Pasternak's "Doctor Zhivago") remarks, toward the end of the book: "And remember: you must never, under any circumstances, despair. To hope and to act, these are our duties in misfortune. To do nothing and to despair is to neglect our duty."

Life is not a clearly demarcated black-or-white affair, comprising either success or failure. Always, a full and genuine life comprises elements of both success and failure. We want to succeed, and we have every right to do so. We can succeed only if we honestly perceive and analyze our failures, and proceed to correct them.

We can even succeed if the whole world believes that we have failed. What do we believe—within our hearts and minds—strongly enough about our values, our objectives and our ideals, to live for them and to die for them? This is ultimately where failure and success become fused in one, and success eradicates failure.

Comics--Like Firms--Need 'Image'

By George Frazer

Boston.

"Comics, said Ed Wynn, "say funny things. Comedians say things funny." But whatever the distinction, they have this in common: They must wear well. For the crucible of the comedian and the comic alike is time—the ravages of the years, the same old audiences in the same old cabarets season after season, the millions upon millions sitting in judgment before their television sets week in week out, and always, of course, the breezy little newcomers who are sure to show up if only you are around long enough. For comedians (light, low, genteel, and slapstick) are not authentic if they are but briefly amusing. They must, as it were, always be "on"—which, in a way, is a very vicious circle indeed, for familiarity does indeed breed contempt and overexposure extinction.

There have, over the yakking years, been some very, very funny men and women in America. There was Chaplin of course. And Harry Langdon and Buster Keaton and W. C. Fields; Robert Benchley and Ted Healy; Laurel & Hardy and Lou Costello; and Willie West & McGinty and Victor Moore, who did a skit for years called "Change Your Act or Back to the Woods"; and Bert Williams and Will Rogers; and, God love them, Marie Dressler and Bea Lillie, who seems more American than British, does her Ladyship. And always, or so it seems, there is Jimmy Durante!

"The Copacabana proudly presents—Jimmy Durante!", a voice exclaims over the public address system, and then there is a fanfare and a pause—and then the rush of recognition that surges up inside of you when the band goes into "You Gotta Start Off Each Day with a Song," and that gnarled, indigent, ageless man with the web-footed walk, that peril of the piano tops, marches forth to battle bedlam. And they love him—that is Durante's image—sweetness; as sweet as Berle's is smart-alecky.

Definitions

For its requires a trademark identification, to achieve greatness as a comedian (and, as the reference books put it, see also Clown, Pantomimist, Humorist, Jackpudding, Jester, Joker, Madcap, Pantaloon, Punster, Storyteller, Wag, Wearer of the Motley, Wit, and Zany). And there is always, of course, the matter of one's own taste. DeGustibus Van non disputandum est, as it were, for wasn't George Selwyn so taken with looking at corpses that Lord Ballard, lying on his deathbead, instructed his servant to show Selwyn in if he should call: "If I'm alive, I'll be delighted to see him," said his Lordship, "and if I'm dead, he'll be glad to see me."

But to get back to men who are funny, men who have established images of themselves. Well, for one, there is Milton Berle.

In that tumultuous time, watching him was a kind of tribal rite, a weekly observance, a folkway. Streets were deserted, shops closed, theatres and night clubs desolate, as an entire country, or so it seemed, hurried home or sought the sensation of the nearest bar & grill with a 17-inch screen. It was eight o'clock of a Tuesday evening and time for Uncle Miltie—for Milton Berle, for Mr. Television himself. And then for 60 minutes some 5,000,000 people gave themselves of laughter that came from deep beneath the ribs, rising and falling into the empty streets like claps of thunder. In those nights, Berle bestrode the nation like a Colossus.

It would be incorrect to say that there had never been anything like it, because there had—Amos 'n' Andy, whose "I-e regusteds" and Madam Queen and Lightnin' and all the rest had been lifted to limp pop too. But except for Amos 'n' Andy, no one has ever received such slipped-disc salaams as Berle did a decade-or-so ago in the living rooms of America. And now he and his image have been around—and the least that can be said for him which is much more than the most than can be said for so many others) is that he's an old pro. More than that, he has been an American image as well, and a completely original one at that. If he expropriated gags of others, we should be grateful really. In his mouth they had the flash of the freshly-minted, as, for that matter, did his whole style, which was 20 years and a plentitude of punchlines away from the gentle humor that had been wafted from the silent and simple annals of the Fresh Air Taxi Cab Co. out into the twilights of the '20s.

Style

So this, then, is a funnyman—Berle. The impudence, the wacchie-ruffled gals, the leer, the index finger deftly tapping the side of the nose, the gaping grin, the pert eye at the backside of the tall, calves-to-ten showgirls—and, as well, the jumping, the song, and the old soft-shoe, the catalyst of confusion and always getting into the act; and so, chicres, my dear, the hand on the hip, the fingertip flicking imaginary mascara from the eyelid, the prancing walk, the lisp, and every minute of it an absolute copy. And that is the image of Berle—Uncle Miltie.

A—for Jack Benny — the

A Sad Ending For D.W.

David Wark Griffith, The Small Town Kentuckian Who Became the First Genius of American Films, Died Under Circumstances Which Then, And Since, Have Nagged at Hollywood's Conscience

By HOMER CROY

(This account of the pathetic anticlimax of a greater career is reprinted herewith by permission of the author and copyright owner, Homer Croy. It constitutes Chapter 16 of "The Star Maker," published by Duell, Sloan & Pearce.—Ed)

He moved into a side-street hotel in Hollywood. Theatrical trunks stood in the room and there were files for office papers. Battered, paint-scarred Indian clubs lay piled in the corner.

January 22, 1948, his birthday, came. Seventy-three — the true date he had hidden so long, but now he did not care. The important thing was to get on with his writing and he threw himself into it more earnestly than ever. He had so much to say, so little time to say it in. He would make the final revision of "The Treadmill." Why! he had been working on that for 51 years. But that was all right. It took time to produce epochs.

Now and then doubt came and stood by his side. After all, was he gifted beyond others? He had contributed more to motion pictures than anybody who had ever lived, but he scorned them, and since he scorned them, he looked on himself as a failure.

A new idea developed. He would make a world-important picture about Christ and Napoleon. He would show a boy seeing the face of Christ in the willows, as he himself had done that morning on the way to school. He would have the thread run through the story, as the Rocking Mother had done in "Intolerance." In the story he would contrast the ways of Christ and Napoleon and would show that the road of love was better than the road of blood. It was a great, a stirring, an important idea. It would be 72 reels long and would run for eight hours; audiences would have to go for three evenings to see it all. But they would go willingly—even eagerly—for it would deal with their souls and why they, themselves, were on this planet. From the tremendous profits he would have money enough to produce "The Treadmill." He threw himself into the scenario, writing till dawn, as he had done so many times before. Now that he had the story, who would produce it? He did not have enough money; the studios looked on him as a ghostly figure out of the past.

He felt sensitive about this, and took umbrage easily. Men who had claimed him as friend found him hard to get along with. He kept more and more to himself. His tall, erect figure, with a big flopping hat, walked along the street—the street where once he had attracted so much attention. A new generation, however, had come along. He was out of the minds of the old stars and they paid little attention to him, and he was too proud to make advances. He became the Forgotten Man of Hollywood.

He let his letters accumulate without opening them, nor did he open telegrams or answer telephone calls. Once he had liked to go into the dining room of a hotel, for there had always been a flutter that the great director had come and could be seen by anyone who wished, but now he had his meals served in his room and ate alone and in embittered silence.

Reporters tried to interview him, but he would not see them. Finally, however, Ezra Goodman, representing P.M., a New York paper, did get to see him. Griffith talked of how wide his reading was and how much he had read during his lifetime and how well he had remembered it. He spoke of the great new film he was going to direct and of "The Treadmill." He said there had been no improvement in motion pictures in 10 years and that 40 years earlier he had made movies from poems and that no one would dare do that today. He spoke of "Pippa Passes" and proudly told how it had been reviewed by the New York Times.

His mind went back, oftener and oftener, to the people he had known in the early days: Edwin S. Porter, "Mr. McCutcheon," as he called him, Billy Bitzer, Mack Sennett, Mary Pickford, the Gish sisters, the ill-fated Bobby Harron, who had committed suicide. Each night he got out his papers and manuscripts and pored over them, making notes, now and then, with his little gold pencil.

He began to complain about "not feeling up to par"; it was the summer heat, he said, for July was upon him. His head "didn't feel right."

He had relatives in Santa Ana, near Los Angeles, and they came to see him. He seemed to want to have his family around him. Some of his nieces and nephews had never seen Crestwood, nor LaGrange; they had missed a great deal, he said; it was where their family had come from. He spoke of the old farm and of the death of his father from the five wounds he had received in the War Between the States. He spoke of his sister Mattie who had read to him stories of the days of old, and who had given him what little education he had. He spoke of the Meffert Stock Company and of Adolph Lestina who had told him that to be a playwright one first had to be an actor. He spoke of the way "The Birth of a Nation" had been received and how people had denounced him.

A brain hemorrhage developed. He died in the Temple Hospital at 8:24 on the morning of July 23, 1948.

He had not made a picture in 16 years and many of the stars did not know that he was still living. They were saddened, they said, that the greatest director of all had died in obscurity and poverty. One paper ran the headline AGED FILM MAN PASSES, and two paragraphs dealing with his career and a mention of what the paper called "the controversial picture"—"The Birth of a Nation."

The press associations got out obituary releases: most of them were wrong, for they were based on the misinformation that, over the years, had gone into the newspaper files.

Personal Memory from Mae Marsh: "During his last days, he walked up and down the streets, a lone, solitary figure. He was acknowledged to be the greatest director who had ever lived, yet no one gave him a chance to direct. With John Ford I went to the funeral parlor where the body lay in state. The attendant told us that only four persons had come to pay their respects; one of them Cecil B. De Mille. But next day, at the funeral, matters were different. The story was in the papers, and photographers would be present. The picture people came trooping."

His funeral was a perfunctory one—for Hollywood. Services were held the next day in the Masonic Temple. A tribute was paid by Charles Bracken, representing the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences, and a eulogy was delivered by Donald Crisp who had played General Grant in "The Birth of a Nation." He lamented the fact that Hollywood had been cold to The Master and that Griffith had "beat against the doors of Hollywood," and that the doors had not opened. The honorary pallbearers were Lionel Barrymore, John Ford, Samuel Goldwyn, Rich-

Brigitte Bardot As of Now: A Less Mixed-Up Mademoiselle

By GENE MOSKOWITZ

Paris.

All Brigitte Bardot wants now, all she has ever wanted, is a peaceful life with about 10 good friends, and, naturally, a good man. But she has never really had it, and will probably never possess it now, but she is more mature about it and finding ways to live with herself. So says Miss Bardot's favorite film producer, Christine Gouze-Renal, who just finished "Vie Privee" (Private Life) with her.

Miss Gouze-Renal is in a position to know one of the world's foremost pic stars and sex symbols well, for she has made four films with her as well as being her close friend. Actually a sort of foster mother, according to the handsome, dynamic femme pic producer.

Miss Bardot came to the top too suddenly. She was only about 18 and had been maried at 16. She never had a chance to mature before she found she could not walk in the street without scenes and with attendance at openings sometimes leading to riots.

But it was not only love that Miss Bardot saw in all this interest, but plenty of hate. This is what frightened her and finally led to her attempted suicide over a year ago, according to Miss Gouze-Renal. She was a victim not of herself but the things she seemed to unleash in the public.

Too Much Too Fast

Her early marriage with director Roger Vadim, who turned her into a star via "And God Created Woman," folded under star pressures and she was soon enmeshed in a series of affairs, plus another marriage, with various young actors, singers etc. Journalistic insistence and public pressures broke them all up. Not all were using her, opines Miss Gouze-Renal, but most were too callow to help her gain any sort of tranquility or repose.

Her status also ruled out any mature man, for public and press interest immediately hounded any such man and his family and, he might even be ruined professionally were he interested. Miss Bardot's need to be alone with friends, and just scrape a guitar and relax, got harder and harder to achieve. It finally brought on her last crisis.

Less Frantic

But now, if still involved with young players, Miss Gouze-Renal claims that B.B. can be alone instead of her frantic need for company leading her into all sorts of adventures. Her frank film character and forthrightness in love, plus her penchant for wearing revealing apparel, or nothing at all, obviously struck a need in world audiences, with the corresponding envies and love-hate attitudes, thinks her intimate.

In "Private Life" Miss Bardot's life is interpreted very liberally. It is not actually her own story but studies the case of an actress who shot to the top too suddenly and what it brought on in her life. Miss Gouze-Renal points out that Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer gave $1,400,000 for the pic for rights outside of France and Italy and French speaking spots without even seeing the script or a foot of rushes. This attests to the Bardot prestige on the film scene today.

Film was directed by Louis Malle and is due to premiere in February. Miss Gouze-Renal says that in the film B.B. is a simple, fairly happy little Swiss miss who goes to a dancing school at 16. She meets a couple older than she is whom she loves. But a feeling for the man has her skipping to Paris where she tries dancing, modeling, and is noticed by a pic producer and suddenly hurtles to stardom.

But this destroys any chance for a real private love. She meets the man she once felt something for, now divorced and an important play producer-director. Love blossoms but he is eclipsed and his world almost destroyed by the journalistic invasion when she comes to see one of his plays being done outdoors at a drama fest.

She climbs up on a building to see, but is followed by a photographer whose flash in her face leads to a fall as the film ends with her writhing as she hurtles to the ground. It implies that she has been pushed off by others and what she has become in spite of herself.

Int'l Film Bureau Meets In Milan Next April

Milan.

The International Film Bureau (BIC) will hold its next general assembly in Milan during the fifth MIFED Film Market organized, as usual, by the Milan Trade Fair, April 23-27. MIFED, semi-annual meeting of film and documentary salesmen, will gather in the north Italian center April 12-29, coincidentally with the Trade Fair itself. Dates are designed to allow buyers and film salesmen to meet in Milan prior to Cannes Film Fest.

The BIC plans to bring out its "white paper" on the film tax situation in January. Tome includes complete roundup on international fiscal film situation, and is designed to serve as a base for national and international pressure for the abolishment of pix tax legislation throughout the world.

GENTLEMEN OF THE PRESS

By P. G. WODEHOUSE

When you reach the age of 80, as I managed to do last October, you have a tendency to look back over the years and regrets pop up, not so much for what you have done as for what you have left undone. I, for instance, as I sit in my inglenook mumbling over my clay pipe, wish I had murdered more interviewers. How I hate their glassy eyes and pimpled faces. On Long Island, where I live, we have a species of bloodsucking tick which nestles in the grass and crawls up the trouser leg. I have seldom met an interviewer who could not have joined the troupe and no questions asked.

I was an interviewer myself once, and I know I must have impressed a number of people in just this way. There was a weekly paper in London 60 years ago which ran a page entitled "The Bravest Deed I Ever Saw," and I used to get a guinea for going around asking celebrities what was the b.d. they ever s. They were all quite nice to me except Winston Churchill, who very wisely refused to see me, but I must have ruined their day. "What was the bravest deed you ever saw?" I would say, and then sit gaping at them like a sheep looking over a hedge. And as hardly any of them had ever seen a brave deed and conversationally I had shot my bolt, rather long silences ensued, and they were relieved when I rose to go.

But at least they had the satisfaction of knowing that I was not going to write a stinker about them.

The mordant interview is a modern product. In the old days a celebrity could be sure that when any member of the Jukes family—as, for instance, myself—called for a chat, what appeared in whatever paper it was would be on the fulsome side. None of that thing you have today of making the fellow look like a piece of cheese. We were reverent then and treated celebrities as celebrities. We featured their noble brows and calm, steady eyes, and would not have dreamed of calling attention to their thinning hair and the bagginess of their trousers. If during our visit they were kind to the dog, we never failed to mention it.

But modern interviewers seem to look on a celebrity as if he were a book that had been sent to them for review. They criticize his appearance. If he bulges in the wrong places, they give his abdomen a couple of paragraphs. Chap who was here the other day called me "an aging Micawber" and talked about my "huge rumpling body." Bless my soul, what illegitimate offspring and sons of bachelors they are, to be sure. What hope is there, I wonder, that they will all choke on fishbones?

As for Those TV Kiddies

The only interviewers to whom, if they were drowning, I would not throw an anvil are the ones on television. The man from the daily paper traps you into unguarded remarks, and if you don't make unguarded remarks invents them and puts them into your mouth, but the television fellow, bless him, never lets you say anything. He is dynamic and effervescing, obviously the life of every party to which he lends his presence, and he is determined that in the half hour you are with him there shall not be a dull moment.

". . . pleasure of introducing Mr. P. G. Wodehouse who, I am sure, will have a whole lot to tell us on the subject of humor . . . what it is, how it differs from wit and all that sort of baloney. Mr. Wodehouse, as you all know, is the creator of those delightful characters . . . of many delightful characters in such books as . . . in many of his delightful books, and we can hardly wait to hear how he does it. Tell me, Mr. Wodehouse . . . you don't mind if I call you Percy?"

"It isn't my . . ."

"Fine. Splendid. Capital. Tell me, Percy, how would you describe the humorist? Sort of as a caricaturist?"

"Well, . . ."

"I thought you would say that. There's always a comic side to life, isn't there? As a matter of fact, a funny thing happened to me on my way to the studio tonight. I was coming along, and this guy comes up to me . . . but it wouldn't seem so funny unless you knew the fellow. Tell me, Percy, getting down to brass tacks, what do you feel has given your writing . . . you do write, don't you? . . . its particular shape?"

"Well, . . ."

"Exactly. Right. Quite. Well, it's been most interesting, Percy, to get your views on this very interesting subject, thank you, thank you, thank you. And now an important announcement from our sponsor?"

That sort of thing is fine, and I am always willing to join in one of these cozy television get-togethers, but if any more New York correspondents of London newspapers come wriggling out from under their flat stones and invading my privacy, dogs—a Boxer and a dachshund—will be set on them. There is something about New York correspondents of London newspapers that makes one doubt that man can really be nature's last word. I have a theory that their editors send them over here just to get them out of the office, and I can understand how they feel. But it is a low trick to play on a friendly ally, who already has to put up with pigeons, Greenwich Village poets and The Twist.

Technicolor Coiff

The only time I ever enjoyed an interview with a New York correspondent of a London paper was one hot day last summer. My visitor was the usual subhuman type, and I think he must have been experimenting with some new form of hair lotion, for gradually, as we sat in the sunshine, his hair began to change color and when he left it was a bright green. Fascinating to watch. It made all the difference to an afternoon which otherwise would have been tedious.

But it is too much to expect this to happen again, and in future when these children of unmarried parents call up to suggest a meeting, I shall imitate the spirited behavior of the Kansas City Athletic baseball club. The director of sports at a Chicago broadcasting station wanted to interview these athletes and was informed by them that they would be charmed if he would do so, provided he first donated $50 to each of them. No 50 fish, no interview. That is the line to take. Might as well make something out of it. We octogenarians have to look to the future.

Greedy Texas Tanktown Talks Itself Out of Civic Venture

By MALCOLM STUART BOYLAN

Hollywood.

A motion picture company on location acts like a gang of juvenile delinquents. That used to be true. Box-lunches scattered over the lawn of the nice guy who lent his estate, for nothing. Hardwood floors dug up by the spikes of the camera tripod. An assistant director bawling at the hostess: "Listen, Fat Lady, get out of the way willya. This is a take."

Oddly enough this didn't hurt the industry. It was the image of Hollywood the public expected. Bad manners were good boxoffice.

Not any more. The beef is on the other hoof. Today at the first rustle of a script, or the wing of a camera's eye, any town in the country except New York and Los Angeles, is out to gyp any production company; to get a greedy little mitten into the till, or take reprisals. Poverty Row is no longer around Hollywood and Gower. It stretches across the country; and by stretch, I mean the outstretched hand, palm up.

Like Big Hat, Texas, for instance. The local grifters didn't succeed in picking MGM's leather. But they did cost me my sale of a shooting script, the public a delightful chunk of entertainment and the boxoffice a probable boffo. It was a great piece of Americana. It still is. It is unlikely now that it will ever reach any screen. Unless the hatchetmen and particularly the hatchetwomen have killed themselves off. Which is wishful thinking.

It was a story newsworthy enough to hit the front page of the Los Angeles Times. Here's the gimmick:

The town of Big Hat adopted a London slum family, father, mother, five kids and brought them to Texas to start a new life.

I considered that springboard enough and gave it the working title of: "The London Cowboys." I took the idea to MGM and they sent me to Big Hat to tie it up. I took my wife.

That was the first mistake. We were miscast. We failed the yokels as Hollywood personalities. My wife is a gentle, soft spoken alumnus of St. Mary's Convent. She dresses in quiet good taste and says "thank you" when a waiter pours a glass of water. I'm a bust too, as representative of a Hollywood studio. I have no little plaid cap with a buckle in the back. No beard. My hair is greaseless and close cropped and I don't snap my fingers for tempo. Renting a car in Big Hat I didn't have showmanship enough to hire a foreign car or hook MGM for a Rolls Royce and driver. I settled for a six cylinder job just short of a jalopy and drove myself. That was no way for a Hollywood writer to act. My wardrobe was all wrong too. A no more glamorous suit than that worn by a Certified Public Accountant. I did go to the best hotel, but I didn't take a suite or throw a cocktail party.

London Cowboys In Texas

No wonder the town was instantly suspicious. What were we up to? I told the committee which had brought the London Cowboys over, that MGM wanted clearance to make a motion picture of the venture, and that I was writing the script. Ah, hah! That was the confession. How much was I going to get for the script? I didn't know. Saying that was a haggle between my agent and the studio. So! The so-called writer from a so-called studio, had a conspirator, and the caper was to cash in on Big Hat's idea.

The town began freezing up. None of that old southern hospitality nonsense. It was obvious my wife and I were in town to rob the bank.

The poor bewildered little British family were to arrive by ship at New Orleans. I was reluctantly allowed to accompany the delegation from Big Hat to meet them. A member of the committee was assigned to sleep in my room at the hotel where we waited over night; presumably to prevent my reaching the family by shore-to-ship telephone and making a deal.

In the morning I elbowed my way through the volunteer bodyguard to meet the family at the gangplank. Trying to get some kind of a commitment, I told the cocky head of the family that MGM wanted to make a picture of their adventures in a strange land.

"Gar blime," he shouted to his bedraggled wife. "This 'ere bloke wants to make a cinema of us. Fancy that!" Then, turning to me he asked: "'ows about 1,000 pounds right 'ere an' now, Guv'ner?"

"No! No! No!" yelled the chairman of the committee in panic. "We've agreed on $200,000!"

"Agreed with whom?", I asked politely.

"Among ourselves. It was all our idea and we don't figure to let you make any money off it."

I still clung to the ridiculous hope that I might be able to make an equitable deal. If there was any chance of this, my wife quickly ruined it by going un-Hollywood. While the rest of us were barreling through the bayous from New Orleans to Big Hat she had gone into the tiny house that had been assigned to the Britishers and was running the vacuum over the carpet.

She hadn't quite finished when the parade rolled up to the door. That did it. We were obviously phony. The chairman of the committee called MGM collect. The collect call was refused because the chairman asked to speak to Bob Hope, who was then at Paramount.

Wrong Prairie

One of the several men who had been shadowing us said Judge Beaumond wanted to see us!

I had probably left that unassuming rental car too near a fireplug. But no. Judge Beaumond wasn't currently on the bench. He was a lawyer—as Joseph Jefferson might have played the part. He had been retained to protect the interests of the committee against one Malcolm Stuart Boylan, purporting to be a Hollywood writer, and one Jane Doe Boylan, purporting to be his wife.

"Now, Suh! Just what do you-all want in our honest community of Big Hat?"

I tried to tell him again. He didn't believe a word of it.

"We have observed your movements carefully since your arrival by train. If yo' are from Hollywood, why didn't yo come by jet?"

"Because I don't like to fly. Does it make any difference how I arrived?"

"It does when a man purports ot represent a Hollywood studio," was his astonished answer. "Neither you or this young lady are what we expect from Hollywood."

"What do you expect from Hollywood?" I asked in genuine curiosity.

"High jinks," he answered.

It was I who had failed to live up to the Hollywood legend, and in failing, failed the industry. We are a legend. In one form or another the public pays to see us. To take down our pants. Or lift up our skirts. The more we show ourselves as normal, decent Americans, the less the people in Big Hat will pay to see us.

I'm sure that Big Hat will never believe that I came to town with a legitimate proposition to make the community favorably famous for a wonderful gesture toward an underprivileged London family. I think they believe to this day that I copied the name Malcolm Stuart Boylan off a book. When they see the name on "The Passion Gabrielle" from Crown Publishers and hear it is doing big business in the book stores, they will say:

"No, Suh! That impostor who invaded our fair city could never write a book! Why he didn't even need a haircut . . ."

Publishing Stocks Today

How They Stack Up

BENNETT CERF

(President of Random House)

Wall Street's sudden interest in the publishing business, which began modestly enough a few years ago, but threatened to get out of hand entirely early in 1961, has already caused some changes in the way the book business is conducted, and hopefully will cause more, but one thing is now crystal-clear.

Bennett Cerf

"Big business" neither will diminish the number of genuinely good books being produced, nor will it dampen the ardor fo any honest publisher to discover same. Furthermore, should the big companies ever become too "commercial," as some doubting Thomases have predicted, there always will be idealistic newcomers ready to snatch the good manuscripts they turn down. The legitimate theatre is backed up by "Off-Broadway"; Hollywood has its "New Wave"; the book has its young men with stars in their eyes who need only find a manuscript they like, hang out a shingle, and become publishers overnight. It costs millions to build a new steel mill or film studio. In publishing, anybody can get into the act!

Furthermore, the fact that many old-line publishers merged or "went public" in the past two years, did not mean that the previous owners were selling out completely. Usually they retained over 50% of their stocks in their own portfolios, thereby insuring a continuity of command and a maintenance of old standards. It was the resultant shortage of stocks in the hands of the public, in fact, that enabled hit-and-run speculators to run the price of some publishing stocks to such ludicrous heights that some scaling down later not only was inevitable but devoutly desired by the publishers themselves.

The get-rich-quick speculators who were responsible for many of these wild run-ups had no more genuine understanding or interest in the publishing business than they had in previous love affairs with the chainstores, drugs, vending machines, and electronics. All they sought was "action." As one of them explained recently, "When you're at the racetrack, who cares about the nags bedded down in their stables? You gotta bet on the horses that are running!"

Now we have entered that healthier transitional period where publishing stocks are selling at a more realistic level, and passing steadily into the hands of genuine investors—mutual funds, institutions, and individuals who recognize the solid and substantial growth potential of the better publishing companies, but do not expect to double their money overnight.

Such investors already are aware of these facts:

1. Mergers and amalgamations, no matter how logical and soundly conceived, do not produce hoped-for economies and increases in profits immediately.

2. Book projects that promise the longest life and the most substantial profits—the so-called "bread and butter" items that constitute the core of a publisher's back-list—usually involve the biggest investment and take the longest time to pay off. A new dictionary or encyclopedia, for instance, or a new line of juveniles or textbooks, take years to plan immaculately, and longer still to produce and market properly. In the meantime, only the substantial outlays show up on the profit and loss statements.

3. Excesses in publishing have cropped up and must be curbed. Too many bad and utterly worthless books are being published in hard covers. And too many bad and good books are being published in paperbacks.

4. The publishers owe it to loyal booksellers to shoulder some of the burden of dealing with a new and very tough form of competition: the discount houses now invading the land like a plague of locusts. These discount houses obviously have no intention of carrying a representative stock of good books; they slash the price of a mere handful of the most conspicuous bestsellers as "loss leaders" to lure customers into ther departments in their stores.

Cut-price competition, however, and temporary excesses of supply are no new problems to the book world; publishers have confronted and licked them time and again in the past. They never obscured for long the ever-expanding demand for good books in America; the need for millions and millions of newly oriented texts; and the swelling Governmental funds available for the purchase of such books.

For the long pull there is only one way a well-rounded and properly managed publishing house can go today. That is up.

War Between Los Angeles & New York

By MYRON ROBERTS

(The spoof which follows appeared first in Carte Blanche Magazine whose editor, Frank Hiteshaw, has confirmed the permission of the author, Myron Roberts, for republication in this Anniversary Edition.—Ed)

Historians agree that the decisive event leading to the beginning of hostilities in the War Between Hollywood and Manhattan occurred when a daring pilot from Disneyland was shot down while attempting to fly at a high altitude over Madison Avenue for the purpose of taking aerial photographs of top secret commercials. New York authorities, incensed by this brazen action, put the captured pilot and the remnants of his aircraft on display at Rockefeller Center and sent off a stiff note to Los Angeles, demanding a public apology and immediate dismissal of the Minister of Culture, Walt Disney. Both demands were heatedly rejected by the Mayor of Los Angeles, who first insisted that the pilot had merely strayed off course while crop dusting; and then, when confronted by a signed confession, admitted everything.

Prior to this event, there were many signs that the two cities might have managed to reconcile their differences peaceably. David Susskind had been invited to tour Hollywood as a gesture of friendship and, in a moment of high good-fellowship, had invited Tony Curtis to tour Manhattan in return. It was widely hoped that a new era of good feeling might be officially confirmed at a summit conference, which was scheduled to be held the following Spring at a Howard Johnson restaurant near Poughkeepsie. But after the spy-plane incident, the invitation was heatedly withdrawn, the meeting cancelled and both sides threw up barricades.

Well-informed persons guessed that war was imminent when Time hinted darkly that "Certain warmongering circles in the West were meeting this week to consider a 'decisive move.'"

Actual hostilities broke out on Sunday afternoon in the Fall of 1961. Residents of Manhattan were enjoying an unusually fine, clear and brisk day, when all the dogs in the city set up a fearful howl; a few seconds later the amazed New Yorkers saw the sun blotted out by a filthy mass of brown-grey air, accompanied by stinging of the eyes, and a foul odor. Not for several minutes did the city realize it was suffering a smog attack.

That afternoon New York's mayor went on all local radio and tv stations to announce that this day, which would long live in infamy, a sneak attack had been launched on New York from a secret smog base in the Fernando Valley. He called upon the people to recognize that from the moment of attack, a state of war existed between the two cities.

Los Angeles leaders denied responsibility, but it was noted that the day had been unusually free of smog in Southern California itself and military analysts conjectured that the city's leaders had somehow perfected a secret device for redirecting the smog from Los Angeles to New York. Indeed, the residents of Pasadena, overcome with joy at seeing the sun, and maddened by the smell of fresh air, ripped off their clothing and rushed up and down Colorado Boulevard, saluting and embracing one another.

The war itself was accepted by the people of Los Angeles, who had long since come to regard it as inevitable, with the stoic spirit of a race inured to the dangers and hardships of life in that city. Only when the mayor announced that the Dodger Stadium, which was finally supposed to be constructed—on grounds formerly occupied by the City Hall at First and Spring Streets—would have to be postponed again, was there any sign of great emotion. Brave men wept unashamedly in the streets, women fainted and Vincent X. Flaherty committed suicide.

While, on the whole, Southern California adapted to the exigencies of war rather slowly, some sacrifices were immediately necessary. The Hollywood Ranch Market was converted to war production. Troops from Police Chief Parker's finest were quartered in the Beverly Hilton and the Sunday edition of The Los Angeles Times was cut to 784 pages.

The hardships suffered by the New Yorkers were even more pitiful. The showing of all Hollywood movies was forbidden and television programs emanating from the West Coast were jammed. As a consequence of this, millions of people wandered the streets each evening—heedless of snow and wind—forlornly looking for something to do. Suffering among teenagers was particularly intense, and some expressed fears that, if the war should be prolonged, an entire generation would grow up unschooled in televised westerns, private eyes, or popular music, and ignorant of the great cultural traditions represented by Jerry Lewis and Tab Hunter. In an effort to meet the emergency, the Jack Paar Show was extended from sundown until 1 a.m., the use of home movies and even the reading of books was encouraged, but the void was far from being filled and authorities were forced to take stern measures against black-marketeers selling rock 'n' roll records, pictures of movie stars, and magazines with Elizabeth Taylor on the cover.

Despite such grave problems, and a serious shortage of oranges, Manhattan girded for war. All Broadway musicals were converted to themes appropriate to the war effort. Thus, "My Fair Lady" became the story of a New Yorker who tries and fails to civilize a Hollywood starlet; and even such dramas as "The Best Man" were rewritten to take the form of a struggle between a cynical Californian and an idealistic New Yorker. Madison Avenue joined the fight with a clever and timely campaign which hinted strongly that everyone in Hollywood had B.O. while all along Wall Street the word was, "You can't do business with Jerry Wald."

Norman Mailer rushed to form a special Greenwich Village Division, The Avant Garde, which shuffled off to war singing, "Give me some Cats who are stout-hearted Cats" to the stirring strains of bongo drums. Beat chicks responded by donating their ponytails to the effort for use as gunsights. David Susskind, Ed Sullivan and Perry Como combined forces for a massive three-day television spectacular, narrated by Eleanor Roosevelt, urging New Yorkers to enlist. The song that was on everyone's lips was, "Don't Cry Lorna, I'm Off to California."

The newspapers threw their strength into the fight. The New York Times gravely called the war "A decisive struggle in the effort to save Western Civilization from the forces of vulgarity and boosterism." The Daily News said simply, "By the time we're through, those sluts and sunbaked morons will wish they'd stayed in Oklahoma!" The Los Angeles Times countered with the charge that New York was "in the grip of Communist-labor union terrorists," while the Un-California Activities Committee launched an investigation into "a secret tie-in between Eastern Intellectuals and Criminal Syndicalism."

Mention should also be made of the daring exploits of individual heroes on both sides: Jayne Mansfield volunteered her heart-shaped swimming pool for the training of frogmen. Frank Sinatra sacrificed his private army to the fight and walked the streets of Beverly Hills alone and unprotected for the duration.

On the other side, Herman Wouk wrote a book, "Susan Sunset," which told how a nice middleclass girl goes to Hollywood to get in the movies and is seduced by the Hollywood Committee For The Arts, Sciences & Professions, with the active assistance of a certain notorious female newspaper columnist. In the end, though, she escapes, makes her way back to Manhattan where she goes into the dry goods business, marries her chief accountant and finds fulfillment riding the subway. Eastern critics raved about the book, especially The New Yorker Magazine's Alistair Arch, who describes it as "viable and elisive—if rather craven." Western critics were less enthused. Hedday Hopper wrote, "Obviously the work of a Communist dupe."

The Motion Picture Producers' Association levied a special assessment on its members to produce atrocity films showing what would happen if the New Yorkers prevailed. One of them Stanley Kramer's "On The Patio," still exists, and has become a classic. It depicts a bleak world of dingy apartments, sordid bars and an annual rainfall of 32.6 inches. Angelenos lit their EZ-Start charcoal barbecues and shuddered by their poolsides at the thought of it, vowing that it must not happen here.

The New Yorkers countered in this propaganda war with books and magazines denouncing the Southern California male as gross, stupid and money-hungry, and the female as brash and utterly lacking in grace or subtlety, flaunting her sex boldly when young, and tending toward bitchiness, obesity and astrology when fully ripened. Everything which bore the Southern California label fell under suspicion. Ranch type houses were shuttered and abandoned. Patriotic New Yorkers went miles out of their way to avoid patronizing supermarkets. Drive-ins were closed by the authorities for fear of civil outbreaks.

Through it all, cynics noted, the Bank of America and the Chase National Bank loaned money to both sides.

The first great battle of the war took place when the Sherman Oaks Commandos, completely outfitted by the May Company and armed with Sears Craftsman weapons, raided Macy's, inflicting severe damage on the notions department and making good their escape before the astonished New Yorkers had recovered from the surprise blow. Leading this gallant band was Walter O'Malley, which called forth the popular designation of this group as O'Malley's Raiders. The original plan called for a raid against the city treasury, but O'Malley changed strategy at the last moment when he discovered that this target was well defended by a group of fierce sportswriters.

Fighting back, a group of Wall Street financiers disclosed details of an economic blockade against Southern California which, it was announced, "would bring the Hollywoodians to their senses." Among the drastic measures adopted were: 1. Non-recognition of credit cards; 2. An embargo on the use of credit in the construction of swimming pools; 3. An order seizing the assets of William Holden, Elizabeth Taylor and Debbie Reynolds; 4. An immediate freeze in the shipment of New York playwrights, actresses, models and directors to the West Coast.

Pressing its economic advantage to the limit, a delegation from New York's financial community entered into secret negotiations with colleagues in San Francisco in an effort to bring the San Franciscans into the war against the hated Angelenos. Los Angeles spies, however, got wind of the scheme, and appealed to world opinion to prevent "The hand that holds the dagger from plunging it in its neighbor's back." In the meantime, agents of the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce were secretly stirring up trouble among the Long Island suburbanites, hoping to fan the spark of antagonism between suburban and metropolitan interests into a flame of secession.

But as the war dragged on, the greater size and superior marksmanship (acquired by plinking starlets with paper wads at wild Hollywood parties) of the Angeleno troops, hardened by years of making westerns and private eye films, began to make itself felt. A decisive breakthrough occurred when the Gunsmoke Gang led, of course, by Matt Dillon, headed off the Bellboy Brigade at the pass and captured the distinguished doorman of the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. As the New Yorkers fell back, they followed a scorched earth policy, burning the motels along the freeways so that the Southern Californians were forced to camp out. When this failed to halt the advancing foe, prices charged at all toll roads leading East were tripled. But even this savage maneuver did not stem the tide and the desperate New Yorkers prepared for an apartment-to-apartment fight to defend their city.

Ultimately, the Hollywoodians pressed on to within sight of the Holland Tunnel. It was at this point that the New Yorkers, cornered with their backs against Long Island, launched the decisive blow of the war.

The scheme was first suggested by the owner of a Bronx delicatessen who remembered the great Carthaginian General Hannibal's feat in crossing the Alps with a herd of elephants. He suggested that an army of New York taxis, driven by intrepid pilots from Brooklyn, could sneak out of New York undetected, race across the nation, thence descending their way along the Hollywood Freeway to the Interchange. Once there, they could quickly cause the greatest traffic jam in history, which, the New Yorker argued, would quickly bring Los Angeles to surrender.

Three months later a suicide squad of 200 taxis quietly left New York and, sticking to back roads, furtively made their way to Los Angeles. In making the perilous journey only two drivers were lost as the result of food eaten in a Kansas diner. Slipping quietly into the early morning traffic, the crafty invaders made their way to the Interchange. Suddenly the agreed-upon signal was flashed and the dauntless little cars leaped to the attack.

Eyewitnesses have attested that the carnage which followed was beyond belief. The taxis hurled themselves against massive trucks. A single Brooklynite backed up traffic to the Tarzana cutoff. Hearing of the great destruction, Police Chief Parker personally rushed into the fray with a volley of $50 traffic tickets. The County Board of Supervisors promptly surrendered. The KTLA telecopter hovered above the scene describing the battle to millions of horrified viewers, and flashing the greatest sig-alert since Napoleon's retreat from Moscow.

By the time the raiders had dashed themselves to pieces, it was obvious that the Interchange would be blocked not for hours or even days, but weeks. The great city writhed in fury and frustration.

Los Angeles soon found itself forced to recall its troops to assist in the monumental cleanup job, thus raising the threat against New York. A few months later, at the Howard Johnson's Conference, a treaty of peace was signed between the warring cities which left both sides in possession of substantially the same territory as before the conflict.

What Will They Think Of Next?

Some 40 years ago, according to this Jan. 12, 1921 report, a "New Traffic Rule (Was) Tried Out On Times Square":

"On Wednesday evening, Jan. 5, a new traffic regulation was tried out in the Times Square district and with all signs of success. The change in regulation made Broadway a one-way street and allowed on that thoroughfare only automobiles going northward from 37th Street to Columbus Circle between 7 p.m. and midnight. Broadway has been a one-way street from 42d to 52d St.

"There was some confusion due to the fact that chauffeurs were ignorant of the new rules, but as a whole it worked out very well considering that it was the first time tried.

"There is a system of lights in the new plan, similar to those on Fifth Avenue. The red light stops all traffic, the green one permits east and west traffic to cross Times Square, and the yellow permits northward traffic to move forward."

Aussie's New B.O. Competition: Poker Machines

By NORMAN B. RYDGE
(Managing Director, Greater Union Theatres)

Sydney.

Surveyed as a market for quality films, Australia holds out strong encouragement to producers and distributors to increase their output in 1962. Close analysis of boxoffice earnings for a wide range of product over the current year clearly shows what the pattern of cinema business will be in the year ahead.

The oldtime strategy of releasing one big attraction and then coasting along with three or four average programmes is today unprofitable to theatres and producers alike. This does not mean that our public demands nothing less than a constant diet of multi-million-dollar giants like "Ben-Hur" or "Spartacus." Time and again the boxoffice has responded surprisingly well to moderately-budgeted attractions possessing an unusual theme or treatment with opportunity for smart selling.

The closing year has been a hard and difficult period for all forms of business and industry in Australia, brought about by severe financial restrictions imposed by the federal government. Serious unemployment and parttime standing down of wage earner in key industries caused an immediate falling off at the boxoffice.

At this moment of writing the peak of the crisis has been passed and the coming months could see a slow but nevertheless gradual return to national economic stability.

At the same time it must be realized that show business in Australia cannot permit any illusions about the difficulties to be surmounted in 1962. Exhibitors must look to producers and distributors to join in setting up a production and marketing policy based on a sympathetic and realistic appreciation of the situation which will provide the means and the incentive to make the most of every opportunity.

New-Type Rivals

As in other countries, Australia has witnessed in recent years, the establishment and growth of a wider variety of powerful competitors in the field of amusements. Typical of these is the extraordinary phenomena of licensed sporting and workmens' clubs, lavish establishments operating on the profits of legalized poker machines.

In New South Wales these clubs have multiplied within a very brief period from 85 to 1,247, the majority located in metropolitan areas adjacent to our leading cinemas. These have a yearly turnover exceeding $200,000,000 and pay out approximately $4,000,000 in taxes on poker machine profits.

For a nominal membership fee of $2 per annum these establishments provide live entertainment, movies, indoor bowling alleys, all-weather tennis courts, gambling, cheap liquor, restaurant service and lavish amenities of all kinds.

There are of course a number of other new styles of competitive forces vying with the cinema for a share of the public's free-spending money and leisure time, but I cite the licensed clubs to point up my opening statement that the Australian market has much to offer the producer of quality attractions.

To my mind these clubs reveal but a fraction of the enormous volume of revenue the Australian public is willing and eager to pay out whenever and wherever the right kind of attraction is put before them.

It is now within our power to divert a greater percentage of this money into the boxoffice. After five years of tv our public now realizes that this is no substitute for good cinema entertainment.

Response to outstanding releases over the past year, notwithstanding the adverse national economic conditions which have prevailed throughout, affords factual proof of the rewards to be won on this market by producer, distributor and exhibitor working together in a spirit of true partnership.

The Theme About Teams

By EDDIE CANTOR

Hollywood.

The first team I remember seeing and enjoying was when I was in my teens. It was McIntyre & Heath, who worked together for more than 40 years. They never spoke a word off stage.

Eddie Cantor

1912! New Mexico and Arizona were admitted as the 47th and 48th states. The American Flag had two more stars, and the American stage sparkled with two bright comedy stars—Weber & Fields.

This team not only owned their own theatre, the Weber & Fields Music Hall, but employed such immortals as Marie Dressler, David Warfield, William Collier, Lillian Russell and many others. They created routines that found their way into musical comedies, revues and burlesque shows.

Both Joe Weber and Lew Fields were born and raised on the East Side of New York. That's what made their material so funny when I caught their comeback at the Palace some years ago. Fields started bragging about his background. "Joe," he said, "I come from a very rich family. We had a governess, a chauffeur, a butler." Weber said, "Don't kid me, Lew—I happen to know where you lived. You were dispossessed so many times—had your furniture put out on the street so often—your mother finally bought curtains to match the sidewalk!"

Cigar-smoking George Burns and zany Gracie Allen crashed the bigtime, along with that other big crash, back in 1929. They've been going strong ever since until Gracie decided she's had enough of it.

If you think some of the things Gracie says professionally are funny, you should hear some of her cracks in private life. One night she called and invited me to a birthday party for George. I thanked her and asked, "Is it to be a surprise?" Gracie said, "I'll say—it's not even his birthday."

George is the best straight man show business has had in the last quarter of a century. Gracie got the laughs, but George, the wonderful pin-boy, who set 'em up.

Offstage, I think it's a mistake to label George a straight man. In a livingroom he's the funniest man I know. Kidding Gracie about her favorite pastime, shopping and bargain-hunting, George said, "Gracie will buy anything she thinks a store is losing money on. Yesterday she said to a clerk, 'Quick, sell me one of those!' The clerk said, 'But Mrs. Burns, that's the elevator.' Gracie said, 'I don't care—it's marked down!'"

Amos 'n' Andy

In 1926 a team by the name of Sam 'n' Henry went on the air, with the opening line, "Henry, did you ever see a mule as slow as this one?" Now, let's be honest: There isn't too much to that line, and yet these two people established characters, characters that were laughable, believable and lovable, and two years later, in 1928, when Sam 'n' Henry changed their names to Amos 'n' Andy they became the most famous of all radio teams.

As a matter of record, and the telephone company will tell you this, there was a time in the life of America, when for 15 minutes every evening, five times a week, unless there was an emergency, telephones were silent—people just had to listen to Amos 'n' Andy. Their "fresh air taxi" was as famous a means of transportation as the Santa Fe Chief or the 20th Century Limited. It was the vehicle that carried them from a broadcasting station in Chicago to the Hollywood studios where they made a motion picture in 1932. It was the same vehicle that carried them into the homes of millions of fans who never deserted them.

Norworth & Bayes

In 1908, a year before I went into show business, the team of Jack Norworth & Nora Bayes, were stars on Broadway, singing their own song, "Shine on—shine on harvest moon—up in the sky. I ain't had no lovin' since January, February, June or July—"

Nora Bayes and Jack Norworth were not only partners on the stage, but partners off, too. Jack was as handsome as Nora was pretty. Their duets, their teamwork in those days, was the talk of show business. They actually laughed as they sang. They enjoyed what they were doing, and it must have been infectious because their audiences were happiest when the couple was on stage. Jack used to write most of their songs. During the baseball season when you hear, "Take me out to the ball game, take me out with the crowd," remember, it was Norworth who wrote it with Al Von Tilzer.

It was a great shock to show business when this couple split up. Soon after, they appeared in London in opposition theatres. Jack was a big hit, Nora was not. She complained to Frank Tinney, American comedian, who was a sensation at the time in England, "Frank, they don't understand me here, and I don't understand them," Frank said, "Why don't you quit?" Nora answered, "Oh, I couldn't do that. I understand their money perfectly." She asked the English management to advertise her more extensively. "Why in America," she told him, "we have electric signs in front of a theatre four feet high!" The manager said, "My dear Miss Bayes, isn't that a bit conspicuous?"

In 1920 Nora Bayes and I played in opposition theatres in Philadelphia. I invited her, after the Wednesday matinee, to have dinner with me. She said, "Do you mind if I bring someone along?" I said, "Bring anyone you like." At 6 o'clock I was sitting in Shover's Restaurant, 3d & Arch Streets—in walked Nora, her leading man, the chorus, the stagehands, wardrobe women, ushers—60 of them in all. I was stunned. She said, "Eddie, I never go out to dinner without my troupe." What a girl. What a dinner. What a bill!

During the years Dean Martin & Jerry Lewis were teamer, they were the most fabulous pair in show business. Since their split, they have individually been great hits. Personally I believe dissolving their partnership was because Dean Martin realized that a straight man is "one who lives on the wrong side of the cracks."

Abbott & Costello, Moran & Mack, Williams & Walker, Smith & Dale, the Marx Bros.—all who made millions making millions laugh at them. Teams to be remembered.

What a Difference a Few Decades Make

(Or, Thoughts While Shaving)

By HARRY RUBY

Hollywood.

When a man gets to be considerably over 21 and somewhat under a hundred, which is exactly my age, he gets to thinking about things. But, lest the reader get the impression from the title of this opus that I am living in the past, I hasten to mention that it was I who said: "There is no time like the present for forgetting about the past"—which is a cinch to wind up in the next edition of Bartlett's Quotations . . . credited to someone like Shakespeare.

Whenever I do think about the past, it is only as a basis of comparison with the events of the present. The other day I got to thinking about the clever things that were said by Mons. Voltaire, the eminent philosopher, historian, dramatist and essayist. I agree with everything the man said, except one—to wit: "The only thoughts worth while are those conceived while walking."

It is true that there are many who do their thinking while walking. (What else can you do while you're walking?) But it is also true that there are those who do their thinking while getting a shave and haircut; or while driving; or while doing any number of things. My thoughts, such as they are, crowd in on me while I am shaving.

Some years ago, when I told this to Bert Kalmar, my good friend and partner of over 25 years, he mulled it over for a few seconds, then looked at me and said: "The touble with you is, you don't shave often enough." Bert was always saying cute things like that.

One morning, while I was contemplating my lather-laden mug in the mirror, I got to thinking about how we moderns react to the things that were considered so shockingly daring, obscene, offensive and suggestive only a few decades ago.

Today, we think nothing of seeing girls, of all shapes and sizes, strolling along the street, shopping in a supermarket, browsing in a bookshop, as scantily clad as it is possible to be without being clad at all. In fact, we have become so used to these sights that we don't give a dainty damsel in dishabille a second thought—or a second look—except for aesthetic reasons, of course.

The other day when I was confronted by one of these sights, I bethought me of a scandal that shook the Bronx back in the days when I was a pupil at P.S. 42. Ida Schnall, who gained a measure of fame for her prowess in the manly sports, was riding a bicycle—fully clad—except that she was wearing bloomers. For this offense, wearing bloomers, she was hauled off to the stationhouse. But she got off with a fine because it was her first offense.

Cigarets and Pubs

Today, when we see a young lady smoking a cigaret in a tv commercial, there is no raising of eyebrows as there used to be in that bygone era—when a girl who smoked was branded a member of the oldest profession.

Even the thought of seeing a girl in a beer saloon in those days would have been horrifying. They were not allowed in—even if escorted. Today, the saloon is called a cocktail lounge, and we think nothing of seeing a girl, unescorted, sitting at the bar. And when, as usually is the case, she is joined by a stranger of the opposite sex, our only reaction is envy . . . Yeah, man!

When I was a kid, which was quite a few years ago, as the crow flies, a man who made a habit of frequenting bars was without respect in the community. He was believed to be a beast who stopped off at the corner saloon on payday, drank up his wages, then went directly home and beat up his wife and kids.

A few weeks ago, I went to Las Vegas to get away from it all. I took in one of the plush spots. The Ladies of the Ensemble had nothing on but the skin they were born in . . . I kept looking at the door to see the cops come crashing in and make a dramatic pinch. If there were any cops there, they were in plain clothes—seeing the show.

Too Rough for Burlesque

Contrast this with a day at the Columbia (now the DeMille) Theatre, on 47th St. and 7th Ave., New York, during the bygone days of burlesque. Millie De Leon, otherwise known as "The Girl in Blue," was the star of the show that was playing there to SRO. The high spot of Millie's specialty was that breathless moment when she raised her skirt a little above her pretty knees, removed a garter and tossed it out to the audience—for some lucky man to catch, have, hold and cherish forevermore.

I was one of the standees the night the cops came crashing through the door, ran down the aisle, stopped the show and arrested "The Girl in Blue" for indecent exposure. Poor Millie was arrested so many times that the cops got tired of it and asked to be transferred to another beat. (George Jessel is the only one I know who still has one of Millie's garters.)

When I see and hear some of the things I see and hear these days in theatres, in the movies, and in night clubs, I get to thinking about the time I went to Boston to teach Eddie Cantor a new comedy song I wrote for him, which he was to introduce in a "Ziegfeld Follies" show that was opening there.

A 'Daring' Punchline

The song was called "When They're Old Enough To Know Better It's Better To Leave Them Alone." I don't think I ever heard a bigger laugh in a theatre than Eddie got when he gave out with the catchline of the second refrain:

Once I went into a fortune-teller's place,
The fortune-teller read my mind—then slapped my face.

Eddie pranced off at the end of the chorus to continued laughter and deafening applause that lasted through part of the scene that followed. Everyone was happy about it, except Florenz Ziegfeld. He demanded that the song be taken out—on the grounds that the hightoned customers who come to see the "Follies" would not stand for such a "dirty" catchline. Eddie turned on those big eyes of his, Ziegfeld weakened, and the song stayed in, dirty catchline and all. The hightoned "Follies" customers stood for it and loved it.

Even more shocking than the Cantor episode was a line Al Jolson pulled one night at the Winter Garden. I was there that night and I'll never forget it. Al pretended to be hoarse. His apology, as he was about to burst into song, ran something like this: "Folks, please bear with me tonight, I'm a little hoarse. But old Al is gonna sing those songs for you just the same. You see, I caught cold. At three o'clock this morning, I got up out of a warm bed and went home."

After a moment of embarrassed and shocked silence, the audience broke out into loud, immoderate and boisterous laughter. I hate to admit it, but the laughter was even louder and longer than Cantor got on that naughty catchline.

But Jolson had to take the line out. Reluctant as he was to do so, the Shuberts convinced him that it was too offcolor and in bad taste. Today, if a nitery comic pulled a line like that he'd be run out of town for being too clean.

Until I read "Lady Chatterley's Lover," when the ban was lifted on it recently, I had no idea how many words there were in the English language with four letters. I recalled how I tried to sneak an unexpurgated copy of the book out of England many years ago. But I thought better of it when told I would be arrested if the book was found on me. Back in 1926, I sneaked a copy of James Joyce's "Ulysses" out of England. After reading that controversial tome in the confines of my stateroom, on the good ship Homeric, I tossed it overboard, rather than run the risk of tangling with the New York authorities.

Today, books like the aforementioned "Lolita," "Peyton Place" and "Tropic of Cancer" are read by little children in their nurses.

In 1923, Kalmar and I wrote the score for our first Broadway show, "Helen of Troy, N. Y." In the book, written by two avant garde guys of those days, George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly, was the word lousy. A hurried meeting was called. Those opposed to the word staying in, which included George Jessel and Rufus LeMaire, the producers of the show, and Bert Kalmar and yours truly, won out over the protests of the authors—and the nasty word was deleted from the text.

I could go on telling you other instances of "What a Difference A Few Decades Make," but it is time to shave and do some more thinking.

Expatriate Versus Ex-Patriot

Globetrotting Film & TV Producer-Writer Appraises the Then & Now In The International Lively Arts—Comparative Creative Behaviorism

By STUART SCHULBERG

On "David Brinkley's Journal" a few months back, we interviewed an American painter who had successfully made the transition from Horse Cave, Ky. to the caves of the Left Bank. After 11 years in Paris he proclaimed, "I don't like the term 'expatriate'—it sounds too much like 'ex-patriot'." There and then he coined a description which millions of stay-at-home Americans would eagerly apply to their fellow-citizens who choose to live abroad. For despite—or perhaps because of—an expatriate tradition which includes Henry James, T. S. Eliot and Hemingway, we continue to raise a collective eyebrow at the rebels no longer in our midst. Perhaps our attitude toward these happy absentees is tinged with envy of them or anxiety for ourselves: at any rate, we tend to dismiss them as nonconformists, off-horses or hedonistic hoboes riding the rails of irresponsibility.

And yet many thousands of Americans—ugly, handsome, quiet and loquacious—have decided to make their home overseas since the war. Rome, Paris, London and Tokya, Munich, Madrid and Mexico City today have the largest American colonies in their history. Some of this transplanted population includes U.S. forces, both military and civilian. But these, the exiled rather than the self-exiled, have little place in this discussion (no matter how vital their place in our current foreign policy). The more intriguing question is why so many other Americans, obeying no orders save whim and desire, have abandoned their native ground to sink new roots in foreign soil.

Before proceeding with this curbstone analysis, it might be well to categorize the non-military expatriates by issuing each element an appropriate name, rank and serial number. They would seem to line up in the following order:

1) The Rich or Retired.
2) The Businessmen.
3) The Foreign Service Corps.
4) The Creative Escapists.
5) The Students.
6) The Political Emigres.

Multi-Hued Patterns

The larger American communities abroad include varying numbers of all six categories, proving that there is nothing homogenous about expatriate society. Aunt Sally on her Cook's Tour or Art Buchwald's famous "visiting fireman" may like to think of overseas Americans as "one big happy family," but in fact it is a household which Eugene O'Neill could have described more accurately than Louisa May Alcott. In the capital cities expatriate groups have little in common with one another beyond the color of their passports (and in the case of many political refugees even that denominator has been cancelled or withdrawn by the State Department). Expatriation creates complex, vivid social patterns of concentric circles and eccentric triangles.

The Rich or Retired form a sort of supra-nationality unto themselves. Their Chief of State, succeeding the Duchess of Windsor, is now Princess Grace; their Exchequer, Jean Paul Getty; their Minister of Information, Elsa Maxwell. First papers are issued along with invitations to the Galas of the Monte Carlo Sporting Club and final citizenship is acquired via mooring rights at Estoril. The International Set's projection of the world would confound Copernicus and astound Mercator. It is bounded to the East by St. Moritz, to the West by Newport, and its North and South limits are Deauville and Palm Beach. Otherwise, except for the continents of Bermuda, Jamaica and Long Island, it is terra incognita.

Next, in order of affluence at least, come the Businessmen. Their social status, based on substantial incomes buttressed by mysterious tax advantages, closely resembles their domestic American cousin's. In Paris, Amsterdam, London and Milan they have established their Chambers of Commerce, American Legion Posts, golf clubs, charities and Martinis-sur-les-rocks. These are the expatriates who make a solemn point of returning to the States twice a year to handle their bonus arrangements and their dental work. Many have taken a keen personal interest in European economic welfare, but the majority remain dedicated to Coolidge's theory that America's business is business, whether or not it is conducted in Spanish pesetas, Deutsche marks or good Swiss francs. In general they are poor mixers with any but their own kind and they tend, as a group, to have the fewest contacts with the "locals." There is at least one American businessman who, 27 years after his arrival in Paris, still relies on his secretary to type out the address for the taxidriver when he wishes to visit the Georges V or Harry's Bar. Somehow he symbolizes the anomaly of the expatriate business community—the Rotary Club meeting at Maxim's.

The Government people live behind their own social walls, shopping their embassy PX's, attending their round-robin cocktail parties, indulging in esoteric shoptalk about slots, post allowances, Form 57's and Fiscal Years. Only the information and cultural affairs officers, by the nature of their work, manage to escape the splendid isolation of the Foreign Service and the Corps Diplomatique. Their status may be privileged, thanks to "CD" license plates on their duty-free cars, cutrate liquor and customs-proof special passports, but the rest of the American colony nonetheless consider these functionaries second-class expatriates. First of all, say the traditionalists, Foreign Service families don't "live on the economy." Translated back into English, this infers that he who lives by Kleenex, Crisco and Campbell's Soup—and thereby fails to sublimiate his native tastes and habits—is ineligible for the club. Secondly, he does not control his own destiny: tomorrow he may be (as indeed a hapless friend of mine was) transferred to Rangoon.

Inter-mural snobbery characterizes American expatriation—and no group is more snobbish than the Creative Escapists. These are the suspect citizens who have moved abroad not for business reasons or the erratic designs of career but in answer to the dulcet demands of the soul. Whether they be painters, novelists, composers, film directors, journalists or tenor sax men, they are convinced that theirs is the true church and Gertrude Stein is their patron saint.

May I lay aside dogma, cant and mystique—not to mention their knives and forks—long enough to produce creative work of real merit. But most of them, proudly weaned from Bourbon, filter cigarets, baseball and The Buck, pride themselves on "getting the feel of the country" (sex and labored discussions with the concierge); "knowing your way around" (first-class bistros, second-class compartments, third-hand Citroens); and "accomplishing something important" (the scandalization of Aunt Sally and an article on Belgium beer tariffs for The Reporter). The Creative Escapist is probably a refugee from an advertising agency, a college faculty, a network, Hollywood or The Vine. Some mean it when they say they have quit the ratrace for good; others still set an indoor track record across the Savoy lobby or through the Excelsior bar to reach the ear of visiting potentates, most of whom turn out to be Max Youngstein.

Then come the Students. They and the creators have little in common beside a taste for Cognac and Gauloises Bleus.

In this era of G.I. Bills and Sen. Fulbright, "student" has become the vaguest term in the Passport Division's lexicon. You do, of course, meet the occasional American Scholar who is really completing that thesis on Henri Bergson, but a majority of the American students on the Continent deserve quotation marks rather than passing marks.

As for the Politicals, they live in their own luxurious leper's colony, untouchable to all but the most sophisticated or naive of their fellow-Americans. Not that the emigres care—their politics are still a social asset in many European circles. Consequently, the average Diner's Club card-carrying American meets them only at the homes of well-meaning British of Continental friends who think it is jolly to hear "another point of view."

Nearly every American in London or Paris sooner or later accepts an invitation to meet "a charming compatriot," only to find himself, a few evenings later, hanging on tight to his wine glass while he defends NBC, Walter Reuther, NATO, Louis Armstrong, Technical Assistance and Ed Murrow against a Power of Darkness who use to live in Akron and root for Ohio State.

Your hosts, who are quick to recognize—and probably reject—a local Communist will find this particular doctrinaire dinner companion "stimulating and refreshing," making the average expatriate feel as provincial as Babbitt trapped in the salon of Mme. de Stael. But later, sneaking off into the alien night, brandishing his Paris Trib like a scimitar against the infidels, the out-manned guest will know, at least, that he is not an "ex-patriot" after all. He may even check on how the Giants are doing when he gets to the Crillon Bar for a nighteap.

The fact remains that all of the groups and sub-groups here outlined—each so different from the other—nevertheless share a common wish to live away from "home." Why? Ask a silly question and you get a silly answer or, more probably, no answer at all.

If you locked T. S. Eliot, Josephine Baker, Paul Getty and Oona O'Neill Chaplin in a room and told them they could not come out until they had framed a concise expatriate manifesto, their cell would become their tomb. One might talk of spiritual values, the other of racial tolerance, one of financial advantage, another of peace. And you could extend the checklist indefinitely—with the third secretary's wife who likes "the servants and the sightseeing" with the ceramicist in Vallauris who needs "the hot simplicity of the Mediterranean"; with my artist friend in Paris who wants "the dignity and respect an artist can find here." Or could ask Bricktop, who mothered three generations of expatriates in Paris and Rome, "Don't get me wrong," she says, pouring another round of champagne at her fashionable boite, "I love America. It's just that I find the pursuit of happiness a little easier over here."

Best of Both Worlds

I think I know why. As a 10-year veteran of Berlin, Paris, the Rhineland and the Riviera (a research field I can recommend to all), I submit that the real lures of expatriation are freedom from social pressure and an augmented sense of individuality. The sights, the servants and the souffles are delightfully but decidely beside the point. For to be an American abroad is to have the best of both worlds—the political security of the passport and the emotional repose of the permis de sejour stamped within it. As a desirable alien in France, Italy, Ireland, Austria, or wherever your art desires, you can abandon yourself to living, undaunted by the demands of any true participation in the life around you. Your trans-Atlantic ticket is a broom sweeping away the PTA, the school board meeting, the March of Dimes, Improvement Society drives, the Girl Scout rallies, office parties, political rallies, benefit dinners, the door-to-door, face-to-face never-ending round of community activities and sociability which are becoming an end in themselves all over America. In Europe, liberated from a booster culture and immune to the tensions of local citizenship, you discover that there are no Joneses to keep up with. The only improvement you need worry about is your own.

In this intoxicating limbo of un-belonging the humblest American expands into a political sage, a brave raconteur, an inspired lover, gourmet, afficionado, Baedaeker, and showoff. In other words, a happy man. An individual. Aunt Sally is impressed. So are your European friends. The most trifling thought becomes a telling comment because the man who concocts it is so singular. The fact is that a foreigner almost anywhere can get away with murder or, still worse, banality. A Frenchman may hold a New York livingroom entranced by stating, "America, she ees so fast, fast, fast, but I like her—how shall I say?—impetuosity!" The same sort of statement, properly translated, accented and amended, will spellbind a Paris salon. For the graduate dilettante, the fainthearted hero, the over-age boy wonder and the stylized intellectual, Europe is a pushover, a willing enchantress offering personal freedom and private importance.

Only rarely is an expatriate's armor pierced by homesickness and remorse. Every four years, bent over his shortwave radio, he listens to the political conventions, confusing the rollcall of states with a poem by Carl Sandburg, crying into his Beajolais and snarling at his mystified European friends.

The same manifestation occurs during the World Series when even devoted expatriate wives desert their husbands to a loneliness so complete that one must re-read Cervantes to plumb its depth. Only then does the expatriate finally come to face his own image, etched red, white and blue against the blackness of Being All Alone. Sometimes he will respond to American cigarets, and then his fellow-expatriates know it's just a matter of time before he books his passage home. But usually he will snap out of it in the classic fashion, by pouring another verre and lighting up an unfiltered, non-mentholated, misshappen Gaulloise from the crush-prone pack. The Louis Armstrong records will be followed by the Piafs, the American blues by the Continental kicks. Once an expatriate, always an escapist.

Who me? I've got to get down to the cutting room. We're doing a show on a bunch of nonconformist hedonist hoboes who call themselves expatriates. We're behind schedule, we have to be on the air Wednesday night (10:30 p.m., E.S.T. on NBC)—and somebody's swiped my Gaulloises!

What Soured La Dolce Vita?

By SAM'L STEINMAN
(The Roman Rambler)

Rome.

It's never been a secret that the Roman patricians gave "La Dolce Vita" a stone-cold-dead reception when it opened. While acclaim came from the Italo public at the boxoffice in the form of many more lire than any other Italo production had ever collected, the real rep of the production was made abroad where its name became synonymous with life on the "V. V. Beach" and its environs, particularly in Parioli, the home of the "Parioli-sites."

As the name and fame of the film spread and visitors came to enjoy the real thing in-the-flesh, so to speak, the "real" characters decided it was high time to make themselves scarce. The most unpopular thing in Rome came to be an identification with the "Dolce Vita" set. As a matter of fact, it never really existed but Federico Fellini concocted the whole idea by putting together a lot of things that did happen and mixing them well with a lot of other things which might have or could have or should have happened—something which no one, except the untalking participants might reveal.

Among those who came to look for the real setting was Vincente Minelli and his troupe of "Two Weeks In Another Town" performers. They authenticated the setting by doing some 10 days of night shooting on the Via Veneto sidewalk outside the Cafe de Paris, latterday successor to Doney's which is alongside the Excelsior Hotel. Once Minelli & Co. had the authentic setting in the can, the Cafe de Paris people realized their identification with "La Dolce Vita" because they were in the film and decided to do something about it. They pulled down the roofing over their entrance and put up an entirely different one. That ended their identification and incidentally killed the realism of the MGM setting. Perhaps Minelli should have stood at Doney's in the first place.

There hasn't been an orgy in print in Rome in ages. They've had questionable affairs in Milan and Venice and in Brescia and Turin, but the Roman set have kept their reps lily-white by staying out of print. Even Novella Parigini, sometime painter, announced that she might marry the father of her child and settle down in Ecuador. The smart set isn't seen in public and you've got to go inside the Excelsior to see the movie stars who find the bar here a refuge from the "papparazzi"—Fellini-formed phrase taking the first half of "Pappagallo" which means parrot and the back half of "bagarazzo" which means cockroach—the freelance photographers who specialize in scandalous scenes for the London Sunday press.

Mending Some Fences

At the moment, Rome is getting over the bad name it was given by the Olympic Games and it's doing its best to set itself up as a solid city as Italy begins its second centenary.

The big event of 1962 will be the Ecumenical Congress at the Vatican and with the arrival of every archbishop and bishop in the world a matter if imminence, the carabinieri are making sure that the city maintains its dignity. These days only Liz Taylor can get away with shopping in tight toreador pants but even she wears a long sable coat over her outfit. Rome is looking forward to 1970 when it will be the setting for a World's Fair to celebrate the 100th anniversary of its status as the capital city of Italy. All this and "La Dolce Vita" don't mix!

Of course, if you're one of those people who won't take no for an answer, here's our own little guide to how-to-find-what's-left-of-the-alleged-dolce-vita:

1. Go to the Luau where the movie stars gather in "Brown Derby" fashion. Maybe one of them will get a little tipsy and do the things Anita Ekberg is supposed to do but doesn't.

2. Sit at Doney's and look at the people who won't be caught dead at Cafe de Paris because they don't want to be identified with the Fellini fable.

3. Try the Via Margutta—Greenwich Village in Rome—and look for the studios occupied by recently-arrived foreign artists. They usually spend their first year behaving the way they think real Roman Bohemians must behave.

4. Pass out your calling card to every girl who passes and whisper that there will be a party at midnight. This will give you a chance to start your own orgy. All of them won't turn up but a certain number will. Of course, they will ask to be reimbursed to the tune of at least 10,000 Lire ($16) which is about triple what you would have to pay movie extras for the same work—and movie extras bring their own sustenance!

5. If you're the type who weeps over "Yes, Virginia, There is a Santa Claus," just see the picture and believe what you see.

6. Take a good look at what your neighbors are doing at home—it's bound to be a lot more wicked than the life these "sinful" Romans are leading.

The Writer At Home

[Good Reporter's Good Insight]

By JIM BISHOP

Sea Bright, N. J.

The surf sounds as though someone slammed a cellar door. It never stops, winter or summer, bad days or good. Sometimes, when the hurricanes spin up out of the south unspent, the foam breaks across the top of the sea wall and flies across the finger of land to the river. The wind shrieks and moans around the eaves of the old house on those days. The wires come down and the lights go out, but this is rare. The old house has been embraced by many a hurricane and it has scorn for windy lovers.

Jim Bishop

There is a street running behind the sea wall, and parallel to it. This is the only street. It connects the village of Sea Bright, New Jersey—a half mile south—with Highlands, N.J., two miles to the north. From the air, the street looks like a solitary dark vein in a tan finger. The whole of the finger is Sandy Hook. Sea Bright is a wart on the second knuckle.

The property on which the house sits runs 224 feet eight inches between the Atlantic Ocean and the Shrewsbury River. Facing the street is a white garden wall, with tall black coachlights, an expanse of crabgrass, a circular macadam drive around an Italian fountain and some pink and white petunias struggling for the sun between flagstones, and then the house.

It is gabled in two stories. The outside is done in varnished redwood; the interior is all knotty pine. There is an enclosed porch on which repose some white iron tables and chairs, and, inside, an assortment of bedrooms, a diningroom with a 10-foot planter and a lighted wall painting of the writer and his family, an all electric kitchen, and a dropped well living room 30 feet square, with fireplace, plum drapes and plum bar, black and white striped wall, and a half dozen paintings of Paris street scenes.

The living room is in the back of the house, facing the river. Flanking it is the writer's office. It has a double desk for His Wordy Majesty and Secretary, wall-to-wall books, two leather sofas, and a pooltable which has a fitted top so that it can be used for matters more urgent than backing the deuce in the side pocket.

Behind all this is a backyard covered with flagstones, a bulkhead, and strung on manila lines, a 35-foot Richardson sloop. All day, in good weather, the writer faces his boat so that his torture is chronic. On the easy days, when the wind is fresh out of the southeast, he sits behind the windscreen on the flying bridge, and heads up the Shrewsbury, around Sandy Hook, and out to sea, feeling the lift and fall of the bows, and listening to the growl of the twin Grays.

He is a good secondrate writer. A very good one. As a man, he is short and gray and compact and he wears the face of a benevolent bulldog, but, as a writer, he has done his homework at the feet of the truly fine writers and has learned much and it is not his fault that he will never be a firstrate writer. He is content with this situation, because he earns good money writing a syndicated newspaper column and some books which, by a crooked cast of the dice, came up seven.

Good Company

The writer is good company, when he is among people he trusts. He tells good stories and he paints the backgrounds with tongue and hands, but, when he is among people for whom he feels no camaraderie, it is apparent at once because he is overly polite and terse and he becomes impatient to be done with the business at hand and be gone.

He has no unique qualities beyond other men, except perhaps in the fields of logic and compassion. He can sniff a silently incredible statement from across a crowded room, and it taints everything which follows with suspicion. He is a sucker for anyone who is hurt or in hard luck, although he argues that he is never a soft touch. This virtue, if it is one, is probably the result of the writer having stopped many right-crosses with his chin in the past. He has a sharp recollection of times when no one would buy anything he wrote and he knows that these times may come and sit with him again.

Sometimes, when young writers come to visit, he sits behind the bar in sports shirt and slacks, pushing the bottle and the ice close to the young man, trading secrets which aren't secrets at all. The young ones are always surprised when The Writer tells them that he writes everything but once.

A One-Take Kid

He never rewrites and he never polishes phrases. This is attributable more to laziness than ability. Long ago, he trained himself to write once and write swiftly, being careful not to permit the fingers to fall on the keys until his mind had captured the proper phrases, the right words. When his books and his columns come out of the machine, he turns them over, with carbon copies, to his secretary, who reads them for typographical errors and then mails them to editor.

The Writer finds a serenity in staring at the river. He can see it and, in dreaming, not see it. Once, the Shrewsbury was part of the sea, but, centuries ago, a big sand spit came up and the river had to learn to run at three knots outbound, and three knots inbound, four times a day. It is uncommon to find the little river standing still. It is either running to meet the sea, or being repulsed by it.

The rusty seagulls ride the tide when they are hungry. They sit staring at the little sun-spangled waves, waiting for the level to lower. When it is ebb, they find a sandbar and dig for clams. There are small fights among them and sometimes, in wheeling flight, a seagull will drop the clam in deep water rather than surrender it to a bird in pursuit. The lonely wailing cry for food is always herad between the crashing of the big green combers across the street. When the clams are plentiful, the birds fly over the sea wall and drop them, then swing wide and lazy in the wind and come back to land on the rocks, picking the meat out of the cracked shell.

If the tide is high, the clams are under water and the big birds sit on the sea wall, blinking and watching the smooth sand below. They wait for infant crabs to come out of the rocks to crawl toward the surf. The birds are patient until the little ones with the cellophane skin are halfway down the beach—too far to make it back to the rocks and too late to run to the water. Then they swoop down in coveys, the wings flapping wildly, the turns tight and skidding, calling to each other to keep away.

The Writer is conscious of all this, just as he is conscious of the beautiful lawns and big homes on the far side of the river. He never tires of looking and he can tell you, if anyone wants to ask, that the river changes mood every 15 minutes, no matter what kind of a day it is. The river has more whims than a millionaire schizophrenic, and it indulges all of them, from the foamy crests of the northeaster to the mirror respect for a sunset in bunt orange and lavendar.

Pleasant Self-Kidding

The Little One writes in this atmosphere, and he kids himself that he needs it. He does not want to remember that he wrote as well, or better, in cheap flats, in noisy newspaper offices, and on trains which crept, creaking, through small towns late at night. He likes to think that he needs the sea and the river. It makes him feel like an artist, especially when he is in the company of people who do not understand good writing.

His concession to art is that he always arises at 9:30 a.m. and retires at 1 a.m. to read for an hour. He works most of the day in a faded terryloth bathrobe, dictating replies to letters, tapping out columns, and researching the next book. There is always a next book and a next column and a next letter to answer. His phone number is unlisted and is unknown to a good many people in Shanghai and Sacramento. He keeps changing it, and advising everyone of the new code. The Writer does a good phone business, but he has never been a fan of the instrument.

He found out, a long time ago, that the best way for him to write is two hours at a time. His thinking can remain uncluttered and fresh for 120 minutes. After that, even when the story is running hot, he stops for coffee, for a cigaret, for conversation with his wife Kelly, for a look at the homework of two little girls if the time is late in the afternoon, or to turn the platter of schmaltz on the high fidelity set if it is early.

Couldn't Take It

Once, when he stopped work for an hour, he picked one of his books off a shelf and started to read it. This was the first time he tried to read—seriously read—his own stuff and it undermined his confidence for a week. He got through 40 pages, and quit. On every page, his mind found sentences and phrases to which it said: "No. Oh my God."

Now, when a book of his comes in, he hefts it and traces his fingers over the jacket and the binding and says: "It looks good." He reads the copyright carefully, and then places the book on a shelf and hopes that his father and his two grown daughters will ask him about it. The little ones are stepdaughters and they have enough trouble with their own writing.

At night, if he is incited to a show opening in New York, he dresses and awaits his wife at the front door. If not, he bathes and puts on slacks and a sports shirt for dinner. Afterward, he sits across the room from a big television set, consulting the Television Guide at 25 minutes after the hour and five minutes to. The Writer is addicted to British mystery movies and gang shows. After the news, he switches to Jack Paar in hopes that something exciting and unexpected will happen. In the gloom, he eats a dish of icecream, being careful to drop some on the sports shirt so that his wife will have a legitimate thing for which to despise him.

At one, he is in bed, turning the shielded tulip light so that it will not keep her awake. He heads quietly with two minds: one is for entertainment; the other is for craftsmanship. When the words begin to blur and spin off the page, he reaches up, switches off the light, and murmurs his night prayer into his pillow, always asking for something and giving nothing.

Sometimes he remains awake for a few minutes, listening to the snapping protest of the old boards in the house when the sea wind is high. At other times, when the fatigue is deep and warm and pleasant, he murmurs: "Give me one more day and I'll do better. Much better."

Don't Seat Me Next To An Actress

By CASKIE STINNETT

Harry Kurnitz once warned me never to turn my back on an actor or actress. "Never forget," he said, "it was an actor that killed Lincoln." Although Kurnitz's admonition seems to have discovered a permanent niche for itself somewhere in my consciousness, it's not treachery that worries me most about actors. It's the nagging worry that sooner or later one of them will bore me to death.

Of all the different professional groups that one is likely to encounter at a cocktail party, a dinner, or some other social foregathering, the one that is holding itself strictly aloof and the one that is maintaining the only total group integrity is the one comprised of a group of actors. And without eavesdropping on their conversation for so much as a second, I can tell you what they're talking about. Actors.

Writers, for example, are sociable people and their interests range up and down the whole spectrum of human behavior, to give you an omelet of metaphors. Just telephone a writer you like (excluding J. D. Salinger, who seems to be a notable exception) and tell him you'd like to drop by later in the afternoon for a little chat, and he'll put the cover on his typewriter, get out the beer, and be waiting for you on the porch. Try to telephone an actor. In the first place, he's not listed in the telephone book, and by the time you've properly identified yourself to his answering service you're exhausted and have probably forgotten what you called about. And when you do make contact, the actor is so enveloped in a cloak of self-admiration that one hesitates to intrude. It seems rude, like creating a disturbance in church.

I would expect a withering of belief in other art forms to be the only accountable reason for the flowering of human concentration on this one, but I've learned that this is not so, either. Actors are usually illiterate where art, music, architecture, or literature are concerned. They haven't tired of them: they never knew anything about them. Picasso is all right but he's no Victor Mature.

From time to time, I've lunched or dined with writers at Sardi's, and from time to time I've lunched or dined with actors or actresses there. The writers—affable creatures that they are—have conversed heartily, seldom casting a look about the room. The actors have kept their eyes fixed on the door or making broad sweeps across the room, intent only upon discovering what other actors or actresses are present. If it's an actress she will smile frequently, but it's the kind of smile she would wear if her feet were killing her, and the conversation will have all of the intellectual subtlety of dialog between two cub scouts.

For a long time I clung to the belief that doctors were the dullest of all dinner companions, but as I've got to know more actors and actresses I've been forced to abandon this position. Compared to the theatre, the medical world is a miracle of extroversion. I have a friend in the theatre—a well-known actress whose marital collapse was presented to the public via press releases from the disconsolate couple—and I cherish a letter from her giving me the inside story of the tragic development. "I found it difficult to stay with him," she wrote wistfully, "after it was so obvious that he was taking me for granite." Come to think of it, I did too.

The Advantages of Coproduction

By ART BUCHWALD

Paris.

One of the mainstays of movie production in Europe is the coproduction. There are, on the average, 12,430 coproductions announced each month in Europe, but the figure falls off sharply in the winter because, in order for a coproducer to operate, he needs a sidewalk cafe.

Art Buchwald

Robert Goldstein, a producer for 20th Century-Fox, stationed in England, was in Paris this week and we discussed the subject with him.

"How many coproduction pictures have you completed?" we asked him.

"None," he replied. "I haven't been able to find anyone to make them with. Coproducers never make pictures. They just announce them. Actually my main job over here is to study the methods of European coproducers and see if we can adapt any of their methods in Hollywood."

Mr. Goldstein said the important thing a coproducer needs is a Diners' Club card so he can get credit at restaurants where coproduction deals are made. He also must carry a script with him. If he doesn't have a script the Beverly Hills telephone book will do. Then if someone questions him he can always say: "We don't have much of a story, but just get a load of this cast."

The object of a coproducer is not to promote a production but to promote the pre-production money. Pre-production money is all the money spent before a picture is made.

It could be spent on a trip to St. Moritz "to contact Gregory Peck," on a new diamond bracelet for a young starlet who is "just right for the part," or on a small Renoir for the producer's office. The skilled coproducer not only must know how to promote the pre-production money, but he also must be able to explain after the pre-production money is spent why the production cannot be made.

In most cases the best reasons for not making a picture are that the stars who were scheduled to do it are not available. Since coproducers always mention stars like Rock Hudson, Cary Grant, Elizabeth Taylor, Audrey Hepburn, Marilyn Monroe or Kim Novak, it's not hard for the coproducer to convince his backers after the pre-production money has been spent that these people won't do it. But occasionally, by some accident, the main stars are available and, by a worse accident, agree to do the film. Then the coproducer is in a spot because he may have to make a picture.

This happened recently to an Italian coproducer who used to hang out at the Excelsior Bar in Rome. He was forced to make the picture and it was a financial success and now he can't get any pre-production money any more and none of the other coproducers will talk to him.

In another case, though, of an English coproducer who found the people he had mentioned had agreed to play in the film, his friends rallied round him and saved him by showing the stars the script.

The best coproduction properties are those that have been in the public domain for the last 200 years. A smart coproducer who is promoting money for "The Count of Monte Cristo" always insists on having a reply by noon the next day. This gives an immediacy to the production and frightens the backer into putting up option money (almost as good as pre-production money).

Some coproducers work with advance men, who make the initial contacts in the restaurant with the financial men. The advance man tells the financial man that he thinks he knows a fellow who has an option on six of the 10 Commandments, and if he can get $50,000 he can tie up the other four. Then the coproducer enters the picture. In most cases the advance man is on a flat fee and is not permitted to eat on the coproducer's Diners' Card.

Once seated—the coproducer stays seated—he has himself paged by the bellboy, who may announce "Samuel Goldwyn is on the phone." The coproducer will reply: "Tell him I'll call him later." It's too dangerous to pretend he is answering the call because another coproducer may grab his seat.

The pinnacle, of course, comparable to running a four-minute mile, is a tri-production among three countries. There are only six tri-producers in Europe at the moment. It may take years to make a tri-production, but if it comes off a producer may have enough pre-production money on hand to live comfortably for the rest of his life.

Copyright Act Still Unclarified On Author's Rights To His Characters

By SAMUEL W. TANNENBAUM
(Johnson & Tannenbaum)

For many years, particularly since the birth of motion pictures, the entertainment industry has had its share of problems. Not only is competition in the uses of titles for plays, motion pictures, radio and television programs still keenly felt, but rivalry among competitors in the entertainmentfield remains unabated. However, in the area of unfair competition, some principles have developed as a guide in the choice of titles.

Now more than ever, there looms up another struggle in the mass of characters taken from copyrighted and public domain stories and novels which have attained popularity over the years. The novelist, dramatist, the motion picture and broadcasting companies are confused by the lack of clear cut decisions upon which they may rely in their selection of a character.

Can the motion picture producer weave into his plot a character from any of the stories by Conan Doyle, Mark Twain, Oscar Wilde and other famous authors, some of whose works may now be in the public domain? Does the fact that the story in which the character appears is in the public domain permit the use of the character in other fictional situations? Under what circumstances can the owner of the copyright of a story who has granted picturization, radio and television rights prevent the motion picture producer or broadcasting company from employing the same character in another motion picture, radio or television program in which the story, plot and incidents are different from the original story?

These are but a few situations with which producers are still wrestling. While we do have the benefit of some decisions and views of commentators, they are far from consistency and clarity.

Producers of popular motion pictures of bygone days have capitalized on reissues with new stars. In like manner, they are anxious to present popular characters of the past eras in up-to-date plots.

The Court, in the well known recent case of Warner Bros. Pictures vs. Columbia Broadcasting System involving the right to the use of the Dashiell Hammett's detective character "Sam Spade" in his Maltese Falcon stories recognized that: " . . . historically and presently detective fiction writers have and do carry the leading characters with their names and individualisms from one story into the succeeding stories."

The Court specifically referred to Edgar Allen Poe, Arthur Conan Doyle, S.S. Van Dine and Earle Stanley Gardner.

Does Copyright Protect?

When a character is pictorially illustrated in a copyrighted story, the illustrations acquire protection by virtue of the copyright of the story.

A manufacturer and dealer of toys reproduced and sold a doll resembling the character "Betty Boop" which was copyrighted as a cartoon. The Court, in sustaining the claim of infringement against such use, stated: "This, a three-dimensional form of doll is an infringement of the two-dimensional picture or drawing."

Likewise, when the comic book containing the cartoons Barney Google and Spark Plug was copyrighted, the pictorial illustrations acquired copyright protection. Therefore, a manufacturer of toy horses Spark Plug and Sparky resembling those characters became liable for infringement of copyright.

As far back as 1914, a stage production of characters resembling the copyrighted Mutt & Jeff cartoons was enjoined by the licensee of the stage rights acquired from the cartoonist.

Therefore, a motion picture company employing a character taken from a copyrighted portrait, illustration or drawing would be liable for infringement.

Competition and Not Copyright

A character used in a story, novel, play, motion picture, radio and television program is only protected in connection with its relationship to the sequences of the locale and incidents of the story.

However, the unauthorized use of a character is an invasion of the property right of the author, the creator of the character, and will be protected under the law of unfair competition. The unauthorized user of the character is unlawfully using the property and trading upon the name and reputation of the creator of the character.

Dashiell Hammett, the well known mystery author of the story "The Maltest Falcon," portraying the character Sam Spade, a private detective, conveyed to Warner Bros. the motion picture, radio and television rights in the specific copyrighted story. Later, Hammett published three original stories employing as the principal character the same character Sam Spade, and granted to CBS the exclusive right to the radio broadcast of "Adventures of Sam Spade."

In denying Warners' claim for infringement against CBS, the Court stated that "The practice of writers to compose sequels to stories is old, and the copyright statute, though amended several times, has never specifically mentioned the point; that if Congress had intended to protect a character in a story it would have so legislated."

Although the Court did not support its decision on infringement of copyright, it is fair to assume that the theory of unfair competition was one of the factors which influenced its decision.

Along the same lines, a circus performer who used the mannerisms and costumes simulating the well known radio character "The Lone Ranger" was enjoined by the copyright proprietor of the radio program on the theory of unfair competition. It was held that "Defendants were attempting to avail themselves of the good will created by the broadcasting of the radio program," and, therefore, perpetrated a fraud upon the public.

Although in the "Abie's Irish Rose" case, Judge Learned Hand was concerned with the issue of the infringement of the plot, he discussed the possibility of a court applying the theory of copyright infringement to the unauthorized use of characters. He stated that no case has arisen involving the copyright infringement of characters.

In that case, Universal Pictures which produced "The Cohens and the Kellys" was not enjoined in an action for infringement by the author of the play "Abie's Irish Rose" from using a similar plot and similar characters.

Bud Fisher, the creator of the cartoons "Mutt and Jeff" had been under exclusive contract to a newspaper to furnish these cartoon strips. The Court decided that the termination of Fisher's contract also ended the newspaper's right to use the cartoon characters and that the right to the use of these characters in new cartoons remained the property of Fisher.

This case should be contrasted with the situation which would exist if during the employment of the cartoonist by the newspaper the cartoons were copyrighted by the newspaper. In such a case, the artist would be deemed to have been an employee for hire and his product would be owned by the newspaper.

As in licenses for the use of literary works generally, an author may impose such restrictions as he chooses on the extent of the use of the character involved. The contract might provide that the use of the character would exist for a stated period of time or that it could only be used in certain media; also that after a certain period all rights to the character would revert to the creator.

As an illustration in the "Maltese Falcon" case, the Court stated that as the contract did not grant the future rights to the character, the author retained such rights.

Since we do not have the benefit of decisive judicial pronouncements on the various problems hereinbefore discussed, the creators and users of characters will welcome an early solution either by legislation or judicial determination.

A Pat Title: 'The Illegals'; Clandestine Israel Documentary Long Before Uris & Preminger

By MEYER LEVIN

(Account which follows is a now-it-can-be-told of an inherently melodramatic attempt to photograph the real-life melodrama of the Jewish exodus to Israel after World War II. The author submitted it for this edition under the general caption, "The Best Thing I Ever Did." It forms a fascinating obbligato to Near-East politics in our time.—Ed)

Tel Aviv.

Every writer gets asked, "What do you consider your best work?"

My answer isn't "Compulsion" or "Eva" or "The Old Bunch" or "Citizen." It's a little-known film called "The Illegals." Until now, this film about a secret Haganah operation seems itself to have been pretty much of a secret. After spending a year shooting the film in the darkness of clandestine border-crossings, and in the unlit holds of an illegal ship, I have tried for 13 years to bring the picture out into the light where people can see it.

Perhaps the light will finally shine, as a new one-hour version is being released, containing many details of this amazing operation that could not be revealed before.

Part of the negative of "The Illegals" was hidden in a correspondent's boots, in Prague, during the Communist takeover in 1948. Another section of the negative was captured by the British when they boarded our illegal ship. This footage had to be stolen back from their triply-guarded headquarters in Jerusalem. I admit the theft.

After all these obstacles had been surmounted, a feature-length version of "The Illegals" was shown briefly, one broiling July, in a non-airconditioned theatre on Broadway. Being perhaps a decade ahead of its time, as to public interest, the film didn't make money. So "The Illegals" got lost for 10 years in a warehouse.

Re-Edited

It took "Exodus" to resurrect it. Someone remembered that there was a "real Exodus," a film of real refugees shot with their real Haganah guides, on the underground route to Israel. I tracked down the negative, got it out of storage. I cut out most of the enacted scenes, leaving only the thread of the story of a young couple trying to reach Palestine in time for their baby to be born there — a story so typical that, among the three hundred women on our illegal ship, over forty were in the same condition as the young woman in our film.

With "The Illegals," because of the intense secrecy of the operation, we never knew quite where, or what we would be allowed to film, until the moment came. And then it was usually pitch-dark, with no illumination allowed, or no current nearby. And in 1947, the supersensitive film negative of today did not yet exist.

But by various improvisations and devices, we got the main movements onto film. There were no retakes.

The project to film the underground exodus began when I was shooting an independent feature, "My Father's House," in Palestine in 1946. Our first sequence was the arrival of refugees on an illegal ship. Suddenly I realized that what went on before our story began was in itself an epic.

Very Sub-Rosa

But back in 1947, I determined to get the modern exodus onto film. In New York, there was a sub-rosa group called Americans for Haganah, raising money with which to buy illegal ships. The instant "My Father's House" was completed, I rushed before this group and begged for an opportunity to film the secret route.

If we managed to get it onto film, how would we save the negative from capture by the British? A cloak-and-dagger New York attorney suggested that I carry a false-bottom guitar, and hide the spools of film inside. Luckily we never used his advice, as our eventual captors stripped us of everything except the clothes on our backs.

We decided, guitar or not, to play the problem by ear, and with a small budget to pay for raw stock, etc., I set off for Paris. I had a phone number. "Ask for Venya."

Venya was a key man in the special Haganah unit called "The Bricha," "The Escape," which had agents scattered over Europe, to organize border-crossings, to lead the refugees all the way to the secret beaches in Italy. During nearly three years of this operation, some 300,000 Jewish survivors were moved across Europe, from Poland, Roumania, Hungary, over the Alps into Italy. A hundred thousand of them were moved across the sea. It was the greatest underground operation in all history.

Gumshoe Techniques

To give cover to my film operation, I obtained from a refugee agency an assignment to film it's work in Poland and other countries. This I carried out, on the side. With me went one cameraman and my two "actors," the young man and woman whom I intended to insert into actual groups of refugees, so as to give the film a cohesive thread.

The young man, Mika, a gym instructor whom I found at a refugee orphanage in Paris, is now in the Israel foreign service. The young woman, Tereska Torres, whose family had escaped from France just as the Nazis completed their occupation, is Mrs. Levin.

Mika got papers as my driver. He couldn't drive, and the papers were never quite in order. More than once, when we filmed him in a group being smuggled over a border, the case was genuine. Tereska could be taken anywhere, even with defective papers, as border guards seemed to have a way of ignoring the presence of a young woman in a car. My cameraman, a Belgium, had legitimate documents, but gave up the job after our first forest night-march.

Moscow Visitor Finds Theatres Shabby Tho Femme Administrators Affable

By HOWARD PEARL

When my English-speaking guide Tanya took me around Moscow to visit the film houses I learned that the Soviet Union may be ahead of us in space engineering but their theatres are as shabby as a nickleodeon of 1911. They know not of luxury or comfort.

The cinemas are small. They average about 1,100 seats. They are drab and sombre. Most of the seating is on the main floor. Balconies have only about six-seven rows of seats. The seats are stiff, straight wood chairs without cushions screwed into the bare wood floor to make continuous rows of stationary seats. One's back is taxed to the utmost while watching a two-hour show.

No decoration or color and no ingenious lighting was noted. While the picture is on, there is not one light burning. We would rate them as "shooting galleries."

In addition to the feature, they show shorts and news in advance. When I attended the Peace Theatre they have unusual names for theatres), I saw a short which displayed the Russian war might in a parade of tanks and soldiers in Red Square. I looked back at the projection booth and saw three projection machines in operation. "Tanya," I said, "I see you have our Cinerama process." "Oh no," she answered, "this is a new Russian process called "Panorama." Most of the Russian films are in color. They produce about 250 per year. Moscow has 150 theatres and a two week run is considered very good. One week is the average.

The entertainment possibilities in Moscow are few. Besides motion picture theatres, the only other attractions are ballet and opera. Opera is performed at the Bolshoi. I passed up opera but saw "Swan Lake" performed at the Stanislavsky. The performance was excellent. Leading dancers were Miss B. T. Bowt and Mr. M. N. Saloe. It was sheer poetry and ecstatic beauty. Some consider the Stanislavsky company better than the Bolshoi which went to U.S. Top price was $3. At the conclusion, the spectators ran down to the foot of the apron and applauded the performers as if they were national heroes. It is an amazing sight to witness. We never react this way in the U.S. Their enthusiasm is boundless and almost over-exaggerated.

Several top restaurants convinced me that Russian cuisine leaves a lot to be desired. Restaurants were very plain. Food was second-rate at best. I had dinner at the Moscow Hotel because I wanted to hear the orchestra play Russian music. The sets were short with long rests in between and the music they played was 75% American compositions. Not a balalaika in the group. In fact, I couldn't find balalaika music anywhere. The one Russian song that they played to death was "Moscow Nights", a fairly melodic ballad. Tanya told me that Van Cliburn played it as an encore in his last recital and tore the house down with it.

Moscow is a city devoid of gaiety. The main diversion of the average Muscovite is a brisk nightly walk through Red Square and up and down Gorky Street. Moscow is the possessor of a strange set of facts: it has very wide streets and boulevards, but very little in the way of automobiles to fill them. Cabs are hard to find and I always had to make special arrangements in advance to have one at my disposal.

Their theatres have no marquees to identify them. They simply utilize six sheet posters on the front wall printed in a silk screen process on canvas.

They learned of "saturation" booking when their picture "Clear Skies" was playing at 35 city houses simultaneously for a fortnight—same film which later divided the 1961 Grand Prize of the Moscow Film Festival.

Their stars are good looking by American standards and have sex appeal—unlike most Russians on the street.

Most theatres in Moscow are run by women. They are called administrators, not managers. In every instance when Tanya introduced me to a theatre administrator, she mentioned that I was gathering material for a feature for VARIETY. This was magic. Russians are vividly aware of the effects of good propaganda. I immediately gained stature and respect. From then on, they were most cordial, friendly and acquiescent, and gave me the run of the place. In fact, I couldn't pay to enter a theatre—they gave me the courtesy of the house.

Ever faithful to her cause, Tanya admonished me to make sure I told VARIETY readers how cordial the Russian administrators were. While she watched, I purposely put down in my notes "administrators were very hospitable." This brought a great big look of satisfaction to Tanya's eyes as I'm sure she felt she was doing a service to her country. When I further suggested that I would like to give Tanya some publicity by mentioning her full name, she demurred and insisted she was to receive "no notoriety." She made this point very emphatically.

The Liberation of Gertrude Stein And Alice B. Toklas in Vichy France

War Correspondent's Intimate Family Letter (Sept. 3, 1944) Gives Closeup on Life Under the Occupation—A Memoir From a Forthcoming Book

By FRANK GERVASI

Aix-Les-Bains, Sept. 3, 1944

This will be the last letter you will receive from France. The day after tomorrow morning I am leaving for Rome and from there I will go to the Balkans, finish my little job and return home for Christmas. If all goes well, therefore, I will be with you again within three months and perhaps, who knows, much sooner.

The battle of France is as good as finished and the Battle of Germany is about to begin. I really don't believe the Hun can long endure. I believe his reserve strength is almost entirely consumed and unless he possesses some new fantastic weapons in good quantity—a possibility but highly unlikely—he will very soon be beaten. October 1st is still my date for cessation of hostilities and I'll modify it only to say "on or about." I trust that the good news which has been coming from all of us here hasn't however, reduced production or affected Roosevelt's chances of reelection.

In this my last letter to you from France I want to tell you the story of the Liberation of Gertrude Stein in which I played a small but profitable part. The day before yesterday, a cold rainy, gusty morning with a cutting early autumn wind, Eric Sevaried stepped into my tent and asked me in his quiet voice whether I would like to go to try to find Gertrude Stein. I had. I confess, completely forgotten her and for a moment, but only for a moment, being tired and cold and anxious to try to think out another piece for Collier's, I demurrd and then said Oh Hell, I'd go. How glad I am that I did.

We climbed into a command car—which is a very large sort of jeep with fairly comfortable leather seats and a top and side curtains to keep out the rain—and started off in the direction of the town of Belley, beyond the river Rhone. The driver was one William Druggan, Boston, Irish, a good guy. He is a swell driver if occasionally an overly fast one. But he knows less about mechanics than he does about esoteric literature. And en route we broke down. It was a lucky breakdown.

Playing It By Ear

You see Eric had only a vague notion of where Gertrude might be. He had prudently telegraphed his office to find out from her publishers where she was staying but the town they designated was not on our map. While we waited for Bill Druggan to get the Command Car started again, a jeep came flying down the road in our direction. This was surprising. There had been no American troops over the roads we had followed. This we knew from the hilariously hearty reception we received in the hamlets and villages en route. We had been the first Americans they'd seen. We flagged the jeep to a stop and it contained a Lieutenant Colonel and a driver. We introduced ourselves—Eric, a swell gent named Price Day of the Baltimore Sun and Newbold Noyes, son of the Washington Star.

The Colonel said he had spent the night at the home of yes, Gertrude Stein. Gertrude apparently, had been in Belley the day our troops entered the town and had immediately seized upon the Colonel and taken him off to her Chateau (The Dovecoter in Culoz, a small out-of-the-way little 17th Century townlet off the beaten path, at the dead end of a road running off the secondary highway to Aix-Les-Bains, to be exact. Beautiful county, by the way, with swift clear and cold streams that abound in trout, tall cottonwoods and poplars lining the roads, sweet smelling fields and great sudden bursts of wildflowers and, of course, the Alps brooding and smiling and boasting in the sky. We must see it together, you and I, and maybe go camping here with the boys.

We found Culoz without any difficulty, though we did have to detour once to find a bridge we could cross upon. The Maquis had blown most of them to delay the Nazi retreat and enable us to catch thousands of them and their tanks and vehicles. At the foot of the main street of the town we found the Assistant Mayor who knew where Madam Stein lived and he personally conducted us to the Chateau La Colombiere.

It's an old grey manse with the graceful roof and towers of French chateaux you know from pictures. We went through the back gate after crossing one of those crystalline streams that runs volubly through the centre of Culoz and provides, I learned later, the drinking water and power for the place and runs the village mill. In a moment we were at the backdoor and looking through polished glass panes at a hatrack and we knew there was no mistake for there, side by side, were two things which must be called hats but which could belong to Gertrude and Alice B. Toklas.

'A Rose Is a Rose Is a Rose'

I remeber as I crossed the threshold the sickening feeling that I couldn't remember a thing Gertrude had ever written, not one line of poetry, nor the title of a book or play. I remembered only "a rose is a rose is a rose . . ." and that Alice B. had been the subject of a famous, or notorious, autobiography.

But I knew that the words Gertrude Stein conveyed a meaning. I was moved when the thin, pale maid brought her in and she half-wadd'ed, half-shuffled towards us and I was the first to greet her and I don't remember anything anyone said except that I remember hearing her say "you don't know how glad I am to see you" and I asked her whether it would be all right for me to hug her and she said sure and I threw my arms about her and she had hers about my ribs and the pressure almost cracked them. Later in the conversation that bubbled and flowed and frothed for nearly three hours, before any of us had any idea what time it was, she was full of the French and how wonderful they've been. She had, among other hard work such as getting food, chopped her own wood. Her arms were strong as a man's.

I had heard about her unwomanliness. Well, to a degree it's true. But I found her quite womanly. She has a kind, inquiring face, almost merry eyes indeterminately brown and a strong mouth and nose. Her hair was cropped and combed mannishly but her principal characteristic is her voice. This is music, lowpitched and smooth and her conversation is even.

She was full of questions. Wanted to know about Ernest Hemingway and Thornton Wilder and Carl Van Vechten and scores of others about whom neither I nor the others knew anything.

Alice B. Toklas

We came upon her and Alice, who has a mellifluous but slightly querulous voice, like the voice you'd expect a slightly crankly fairly aunt, an aging fairy aunt to have. She is a little gnome of a woman, with shaggy short hair that resembles an unkempt wig and she has hair on her upper lip and is slightly twisted and very small and altogether ugly but at the same time one of the politest and most considerate persons I've ever known. I couldn't stand either of them for more than four hours at a time and then perhaps only once every six months but those four hours every six months would be a delight if only to listen to the tonal counterpoints of the wonderful voices of these two.

We came on them while they were lunching two friends, a husband and his wife, name of Schwab, professorial and schoolmistressish, respectively, both so happy to see Americans.

Alice fluted out orders and soon lunch for four became lunch for eight. Bill Druggan, the driver, ate in the kitchen and drank, it developed, far more vin de la victoire than was good for him or our ride back. Noyes contributed wonderment at how the household managed to supply four extra meals so quickly and Gertrude waved him off, and then we settled down to talking about her four years under the Nazis.

Much of this-to-follow-you probably already know, from having heard the radio and read the news stories, but I'll highlight it for you so that you'll have a complete picture.

Bravery and Humanity

She told that not all the Vichy people were bad, only the leaders were bad, and the French Vichy Militia of course, but that the officials and functionaries and everyone generally were in the Maquis or the FFI and kidding the Germans all the time.

As an American and a Jewess to boot she was fair game for the Gestapo but the French officials never allowed the enemy to discover her identity or her whereabouts. Three times she had German soldiers in the house as unpaying guests and she let her servants deal with them—servants with wonderful names like Olympe

Co-Prod. Real Key To Any Boom For Israeli Film Biz

By JOSEPH LAPID

Tel Aviv.

Don't ever mention Ingmar Bergman's name to an Israeli film producer.

Since "Wild Strawberries" reached the local screens—it happened belatedly—there is no more excuse left for producers here.

For years, they were claiming that it is impossible to make really good pictures in a small country, on a low budget, with limited equipment. Rather convincing arguments, especially when one sees many bad pictures coming from counties much bigger than Israel.

But why can Ingmar Bergman do it?

He, too, is working under unfavorable circumstances. He doesn't even have the brilliant light which descends on Israel for eight months in a year. So why can he do it? Or: why can't Israel do the same?

The answer is simple—all you need is the touch of a genius.

Neither the stories of the Old Testament nor the originality of the "New Wave" will help. What the Israeli film industry lacks are people who know how to make pictures.

It is a standard joke here that the only non-Jewish moviemaker in Hollywood is a certain Mr. Metro, of MGM. So where are they?

The Peace Corps should really send to Israel a few good directors.

Some of the best film stories ever written are contained in a local book—the Bible. The Israeli War of Independence was used by Americans for a tremendous hit — "Exodus." Everybody seems to have a good time using local material, but the "natives."

This year hardly half a dozen Israeli pictures will reach the market. This is in addition to a few foreign pictures made in Israel, independently or as coproductions. Stanley Kramer is still pondering whether or not to produce "My Glorious Brothers" here.

Though the Old Testament is the bread and butter of contemporary Israeli culture-literature, history, etc.—no Bibical pictures will be made by Israelis in the forseeable future. Maybe people here have too much respect for the Bible.

The pictures in the making are all based on contemporary Israel, by and large divided into two groups: comedies and war.

The reason why they make comedies is rather pathetic: because "I Like Mike," a comedy released last year abroad it was called "Surprise Party" in order to avoid political connotations), was practically the only profitable picture so far in the history of film making in Israel.

Kishon's Duo

Two plays by Israel's foremost humorist, Ephraim Kishon are to be made into pictures. Geva Films studio is preparing the "Blaumilch Canal," directed by American-born Hy Kalus. It is a satire on redtape. A man escapes a lunatic asylum and turns the main street of Tel Aviv into a canal in order to transform the city into the "Venice of the Middle East." The point is that he gets all the necessary help from the authorities because every bureaucrat believes that the man is acting upon orders from another authority.

The other comedy, "Not a Word to Morgenstern," an independent production, is using Israel's favorite hobby, archeaology, as a pretext to present the more hilarious aspects of the Hebrew student's life.

A third one, shooting scheduled for April, to be directed by another American-born Israeli, Peter Frye, is based on a musical comedy by Aharon Meged, called "5:5." You might call it, "How to make boys and girls happy, without really trying."

Herzlia, the other (relatively) large Israeli studio, has just finished shooting on "Sinaia," directed by Ivan Lengyel, one of Otto Preminger's assistants on "Exodus." This melodrama is based on a true story which happened in 1956 during the Suez campaign when the Israelis swept the Sinai desert. A commando unit of the Israeli army had reached an abandoned Bedouin camp. While searching for snipers, the Israeli soldiers found an infant beside her dead mother. They "adopted" the baby, sent her to a hospital. She is now six years old, her name is Sinaia (after the Sinai desert) and she plays herself in the picture.

Another film in the same vain is "What a Gang!", directed by Zeev Havazeleth in Geva studio. This is the story of a "Palmach" unit—the crack units of the Jewish underground during the British rule in Palestine.

The average budget of a picture is $100,000. The better part of the directors and practically all the actors are theatre people. The average time of shooting is one month; the spoken language is Hebrew; the color: black and white.

It will take a long time for the Israeli film industry to develop properly, unless more foreigners come over for coproductions.

There is a special law, supporting such business ventures. Actors are good and they speak English. The studios are small, but adequately equipped for low-budget productions. The country is hospitable and interesting, the distances between sea and mountains small and the roads good. More expensive than Spain or Yugoslavia, but much cheaper than France or Italy, Israelis are eager to go along with anybody who wants to make pictures with them. It is a real mystery why outside producers don't follow the example set by Preminger, whose standards are high but he was happy with the conditions under which he made "Exodus" here.

Theatre Party

By ARTHUR L. LIPPMANN

What a beautiful sight, bathed in sweetness and light
And couturier-copy resplendence!
What resounding applause! What a wonderful cause
To attract such a record attendance!

What a marvelous show, with the touch of a pro
In its facile and finished construction!
Though the tickets were steep, no one uttered a peep
For the tix had a Tax Deduction—
A rather respectable,
Really delectable,
Quite irresistible,
Legally listable
Income Tax Deduction!

* * * *

Mrs. Keene, like a queen, wore a green velveteen
That went well with her tresses (now titian.)
Then she spied Mrs. Brown in the very same gown
From the very same shop in their split-level town—
So she headed for home as the curtain came down
At the start of the first intermission!
(P.S. What a mess! In her dire distress,
Mrs. Keene left the scene looking green as her dress!)

Mr. Harris (in Paris last summer one week)
Described the production as "Tray-Mig-ni-feck."
Mr. Blue in Row Q who pronounced it a "bore"
Wasn't even aware that he'd seen it before!

(Two stars on the stage—one of whom had been shot—
At this point were perplexed by the laughs that they got,
For this was one spot where the playwright had not Attempted to plant any laughs in the plot!)

Mrs. Kraus viewed the house and then said to her spouse:
"You're the handsomest husband who's here."
Thereupon Mr. Kraus, less a man than a mouse,
Meekly said with a sigh to his sly little spouse:
"Go and buy that new necklace, my dear."

Mrs. Cole, bless her soul, wore a mink hat and stole,
And the compliments came by the dozens,
Till her pal, Mrs. Lee, told the gals in Row E:
"Those furs aren't hers—they're her cousin's!"

(An actor offstage, hitherto not on view,
Was thrown off his cue by a raucous "YOO-HOO!"—
Addressed by a patron in BALCONY K
To a modish young matron in ORCHESTRA A.)

* * * * *

A few of the folks did remarkably well
In The Lounge while awaiting the Second Act Bell:

Mrs. Bligh, quite as high as the snows on Mount Shasta,
Enlisted a fourth for her Friday Canasta.
Mr. Mott sold his yacht, Mr. Starr sold his car,
Mr. Farr "sold" a blonde whom he'd met at a bar!

Mrs. Slaughter (whose daughter was now twenty-two
Arranged for her darling to meet a young man
Whose mother owned stacks of American Can,
American Motors and Great A & P—
Plus a beautiful bundle of A T & T!

* * * *

There were people greeting people whom they didn't quite recall—
Yet they kissed and reminisced about the past,
And a most delightful evening was enjoyed by one and all—
With the possible exception of The Cast.

But, Gentle Reader, don't deplore
These clambakes on The Skubert Shore
That gayly start at eventide.
They fill the till—and what is more—
They wear a kind of halo, for
They have The Angels on their side!

Your Company's Annual Meeting

By HAROLD ROBBINS

It was exactly 10 o'clock when The Big Man stepped up to the podium and rapped it with his gavel to bring the meeting to order. There were a few moments of hubbub as the crowd of people found their seats and turned expectant faces toward the podium.

"We will begin the 40th annual meeting of the Magna Charta Film Co. Inc. with the usual report of the president to the stockholders," he said into the microphone.

There was desultory applause.

The Big Man cleared his throat as he picked up a sheaf of paper and placed it on the podium before him. "Ladies and Gentlemen," he began in solemn tones. "This has been a year of many problems within our industry but I would like to say at the very outset of this meeting, that your company has surmounted these problems and reports a profit of over $3,000,000."

He was interrupted by a few scattered handclaps and then he continued. "Of course this profit was before taxes and certain officers' and employees' profitsharing participations, but the amount transferred to earned surplus was still a respectable figure—$150,000."

No applause.

"Despite this we will continue to pay our regular annual dividend at the rate of $1 per share, totaling $2,300.000."

Applause.

He smiled and held up his hand. "This is of course made possible by energy and astuteness of your management in pursuing new-found sources of revenue and translating them into capital gains for your company. I will mention here, briefly, the outstanding elements in this category.

Wonderfully Diversified

"One. For many years we have owned our own studio consisting of 390 acres of prime realestate in what is now the heart of the city. During this past year we have divested ourselves of the burden of keeping up this vast property by selling it to The Realty Development Corp. for $10,000,000, a profit to us of $8,000,000. We then entered into a leaseback of facilities agreement with the new owners for the sum of $1,000,000 a year, five years payable in advance and the balance payable over the 10-year lease period. Since maintenance and upkeep of these facilities had cost us more than $2,000,000 annually, we thereby realize in addition to our profit of $8,000,000, a saving of $1,000,000 a year. This saving will be reflected in our operations during the lease period since we thought it a practical matter to set up our gain on the sale of the property as a reserve against rental under the lease."

He paused for a drink of water.

"Two. The sale of our old films to television have resulted in a profit of approximately $2,000,000 during the last year and a conservative appraisal of our post-48s indicates that we should benefit by at least $50,000,000 when the time comes for their sale to television. This subject is of course under constant scrutiny and analysis by your management.

"Three. Your company has realized substantial profits from the other industries it has acquired in the course of the diversification program initiated by your management during the past few years. I quote some of the profit figures shown by these companies.

"Sandbox Toy Co., $5,000,000.

"Magnetic Girdle & Brassiere Co., $9,000,000.

"Peppy Hamburger Drive-Ins Co., $12,000,000.

"Reedy Record Co., $4,000,000."

He paused and looked around the auditorium. "I think you must agree, ladies and gentlemen, this is a very impressive record indeed."

Polite applause. He smiled and held up his hand. "It is, of course, unfortunate that all these profits were offset by a loss due to operations of the parent company, but this is the unhappy nature of the motion picture industry today."

A small, timid-looking man in a gray suit rose at the rear of the auditorium. He held up his hand like a child at school. "Mr. President," he squeaked.

Mr. Big gestured to the man. "The chair recognizes the gentleman in the gray suit."

"Mr. President," the little man's voice still squeaked. "How much of the parent company's loss was due to the motion pictures produced during the last year?"

Mr. Big shuffled through the papers before him. He turned and whispered something to the other officers of the company. A moment later they were all whispering to one another.

Mr. Big turned back to the stockholders. His face was flushed and angry. "There was no loss charged to last year's productions."

"Why not?" the little man asked.

Mr. Big's face grew glum. "We were so busy with our other activities we forgot to make any pictures."

A silence fell in the auditorium.

"Could it be, sir?" he asked. "That is what is the matter with Hollywood?"

The Lecture Circuit

Much Different Since Mark Twain Pioneered The Chautauquas

By HARRY GOLDEN

Charlotte, N.C.

It took Mark Twain, the real pioneer of the lecture circuit, at least four weeks to make 10 lectures. I can make 10 lectures in 11 days. Don't confuse these statistics. I do not think I am a better lecturer than Mark Twain, although to be truthful I never heard him speak. I simply mean I can make more lectures than he with that much more attendant trouble. Making 10 lectures in 11 days means I arise that much more often at 4:15 a.m. to catch a 6:00 plane to carry me from Scranton to Omaha where I can change flights to get to Houston by 6 p.m.

This is the hard core of the lecturer's problem. The agency that books my lectures for me reads an entirely different schedule than the ones the airlines print. My booking agency arranges entirely nonexistent transportation. If it is hard to get from Scranton to Houston—no matter; they let me change planes in Omaha which relieves them of consequent worries about my itinerary. What little leisure the lecturer can squeeze into those 11 days is spent listening to airline clerks tell him no, you can't get to Houston from Omaha at that time. Very probably you can't get to Houston from Omaha at all. Airline clerks repeat, as a matter of note, the advice that it is impossible to get there from here.

Punctuating these tete-a-tetes with the harrassed airlines people are the phonecalls from whatever program chairman has booked me.

He wonders can I get there a few hours earlier. It seems he has just been able to arrange a press conference and thinks I would enjoy meeting the fourth estate. These calls can usually be silenced by my telling the program

Confessions of A Press Agent

How Profession (or Racket) Has Grown Since P. T. Barnum's Era

By RICHARD MANEY

Pressagentry is a confusing and contradictory craft crawling with pitfalls and pratfalls and overwrought rhetoric. Even its label is deceptive. It was practiced before the press was invented. Those engaged in it are not agents for or of the press. They're spokesmen for those who would be glorified or inflated in the press. The origin of pressagentry is clouded. Some hold that it is an offshoot of witchcraft or an extension of alchemy. Others argue that it was rife in Rome in the time of the Triumvirate and cite "Caveat Emptor" to prove it. In its global manifestations it is called propaganda, in its lurid phases ballyhooey. For semantic reasons only in the amusement world is it identified as pressagentry.

Dick Maney

Pressagentry, in its popular connotations, has been a growing industry or racket since Phineas T. Barnum, an adjective-crazed Yankee, parlayed a Connecticut dwarf, General Tom Thumb, and a Virginia slave, Joise Heth, whom he palmed off as the 161-year-old nurse of George Washington, into "The Greatest Show on Earth." Barnum had other things on his conscience, coined the baby contest, the beauty contest and the slogan, "There's a sucker born every minute." Because of his humbugs and the excesses of his successors, pressagentry long was regarded as an activity peculiar to the circus and the theatre, and its operatives classed with counterfeiters and con men.

There was another reason for the plight of the press agent — the odium of his clients. Actors and actresses, no matter how gay or gifted, were considered a loose tribe and the theatre, to quote the pastor of New York's Brick Presbyterian Church, "a profane and sinful place of carnal recreation."

Most of the prejudices against theatre folk has been dissipated in the last half century. The Helen Gahagan who starred in "Tonight or Never" represented California in the lower house of Congress. Mike Todd and Billy Rose blueprinted their visions to the Harvard Business School. Louis "Satchmo" Armstrong was a missionary for the State Dept. in Asia and Africa. Irene Dunne sat in the General Assembly at the United Nations. A statue of George M. Cohan adorns Duffy Square. Jock Whitney, the angel for "Broken Dishes" and "There Goes the Bride," was our Ambassador to the Court of St. James.

Birth of The Image

With the desegregation of the performers, the prospect of the press agent brightened. It had started to glow in 1908 when the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Rockefellers, wincing under the barbs of Ida M. Tarbell and Lincoln Steffens, engaged Ivy M. Lee to give the public a flattering picture of their corporate antics.

The press agent's role is to foment publicity, i.e., free publicity, and fan it once it starts to glow. There are two kinds of publicity, good and bad. Publicity is what Jayne Mansfield gets through tenacity and what Garbo gets by default. It's what Maria Callas got when she was bounced by Rudolf Bing and what Orson Welles reaped when he played King Lear in a wheelchair.

Big Blowhard Era

Pressagentry achieved peak production between 1910 and 1925. The screen was silent, radio was scratchy and television was a madman's dream. Stage news and gossip monopolized the amusement pages. Editors were susceptible to the tantrums and heresies of theatre people, hence condoned the hoaxes of their heralds. The milk-bath, tanbark-in-the-street stunts were born of collusion. Today's press agent shuns such devices. Through experience he has learned that deception doesn't pay. Editors no longer collude. He shuns the superlatives of his ancestors. The most effective publicity is that which is most artfully disguised.

Press agents are conditioned to mirages. Of the 200 productions announced for any season, all but 60 will turn out to be phantoms. In explaining these and other lapses, the press agent resorts to euphemisms. He cites failure to get Helen Hayes for the star role and Moss Hart for director, rather than the manager's inability to raise $100,000, as the reason for the balk.

Flops don't fold in Philadelphia. They're withdrawn for revision. Actors aren't fired during rehearsal. They withdraw, by mutual consent, because their role has been altered or excised. This facesaving chicane is transparent to the experienced. No matter how discursive the press agent's release, the drama editor boils it down to "Marilyn Peters has replaced Bettina Barlow in 'The Dreary and the Damned'." On reading this Bettina nominates the press agent for all-American Judas. Marilyn is piqued, too. She had hoped for more elaborate identification.

The current press agent is a one-man claque, skilled in first aid and dauntless in the face of disaster.

Since January of '56 I have luxuriated in the fame of "My Fair Lady," perhaps the greatest musical comedy hit of all time. An incessant sellout, "My Fair Lady" is a press agent's notion of the millenium. It automatically reversed my professional position. The editors whom I commonly besieged, now besieged me. So great and insistent were the demands on the offstage hours of Julie Andrews that I drew a warning from producer Herman Levin. "Lay off!" he cried. "Julie's got to get some sleep. Use a little discretion. Another week of this and she'll be a litter case."

Ballyhooey's Labors Lost

The instrument is yet to be invented which can measure the impact of publicity on the boxoffice. Regardless of my industry and ingenuity, more than once I've been haunted by the suspicion that I'm yodeling in an echo chamber. I was crushed by such a suspicion in February of '41 when I alerted the nation to Ethel Barrymore's 40th anniversary as a star. A celebration to memorialize the Miss Barrymore long reign was a publicity setup, provided she would hold still for it.

The tribute mushroomed beyond my hopes. All New York's newspapers saluted her. Feature writers reviewed her past and dwelt on the caprices of her clan. They cited her loves and hates and laureled her performance of the Welsh schoolmistress in "The Corn is Green." She was toasted by the wire services. Walter Winchell, then at his apogee, gave her a column that was duplicated in the 400 newspapers which carried his pontifications. Syndicated oracles hailed her preeminence. NBC sponsored an hour-long coast-to-coast radio testimonial in which she was cheered by Helen Hayes, Alexander Woollcott, Arthur Hopkins, Herman Shumlin and Louis B. Mayer. Unseen millions were enchanted by a 10-minute exchange between Miss Barrymore and brothers, Lionel and John. Setting up this triolog was a coup comparable to scaling Everest in moccasins. Only in "Rasputin and the Empress" had the three merged forces before.

What was the effect of this barrage on the b.o. of "The Corn is Green?" It tapered off.

The press agent's employer often badgers him into typing trivia which can only win him the scorn of the recipient. Ordered to issue a daily bulletin on "Star and Garter," p.a. James Davis in desperation announced that the show's featured player, stripteaser Georgia Sothern, had been elected to the Book-of-the-Month Club. Questioned by the Theatre Guild's Theresa Helburn about his efforts in behalf of Maxwell Anderson's "Valley Forge," p.a. Russel Crouse whipped out a postage stamp bearing the likeness of George Washington in proof of his influence and ingenuity.

Publicity, no matter how ably plotted and aired, can backfire and mutilate its author. Consider the wounds suffered by Mike Todd when he took over Madison Square Garden for a party for "a few of my friends" to commemorate the first year of "Around the World in 80 Days" on Broadway. To cement his position as America's most spectacular showman, Todd schemed a black-tie revel that would dwarf the Durbar at Delhi and the Feast of Belleshazzar. The 18,000 guests were the flower of the amusement world, cafe society, Lindy's Restaurant and the literary world. They were to be entertained by spectacle and pageantry, by Mummers from Philadelphia, bands and orchestras, and Sir Cedric Hardwicke atop a rented elephant.

They were promised free champagne, free caviar, hams from Holland, shrimps from New Orleans, and Charrington ale from London. Gifts, food and drink were promoted by Todd's press department from dealers, vintners, merchants and manufacturers, all baited by the prospect by having their contributions cited on the 90-minute TV coverage of the proceedings for which CBS paid Todd $350,000. At Todd's invitation and expense 300 motion picture critics and editors flew in for the fantasy from such remote spots as Miami, Los Angeles and Vancouver. Photographers descended on the Garden like a swarm of locusts. Uninvited notables moaned and beat their breasts, since attendance at the saturnalia was looked upon as a social must.

Next day's newspapers reported that it was the most disgraceful brawl in New York's history. Todd had underestimated the temper of his guests and the cupidity of those who were to serve them. Champagne, programs and paper plates were sold to the highest bidders. Those who managed to crash through to the floats bearing food, clawed it up with their bare hands. Elsa Maxwell was hit in the eye with a flying hotdog. Gowns were torn, dinner coats plastered with mustard. Larceny was rampant. One guest was apprehended as he staggered from the arena with an electric washer on his back. When the last celebrant had fled, six inches of debris covered the Garden's floor.

As he lives by publicity, so the press agent dies by it. Four times out of five he is maimed by a set of sour notices before he can ink his mimeograph machine. Under the theatre's sellout-or-sink setup no exhibit thus bludgeoned can survive unles it has a huge advance sale, a star whose name transcends all stigmas, or a producer indifferent to bankruptcy. If, in a spasm of sanity, the press agent recommends that it might be well to adjourn on Saturday, he is set down as a saboteur. So distinguished a lady as Sarah Churchill took me to task when I was skeptical of the future of "Gramercy Ghost," the mishmash in which she was mired. She said I would do well to emulate the shoemaker and stick to my last. "Gramercy Ghost" ran for 100 performances and lost another $50,000.

Progressively pressagentry is becoming more pedestrian and routine. Theatre people, long noted for their accentricities and launcies, are victims of national lust for conformity. They're as well behaved, for the most part, as so many actuaries. Haunted by insecurity, they shrink from controversy. A rebellious exception is Tallulah Bankhead. Miss Bankhead fears nothing that walks, talks or ticks. She has opinions about everything and spits them out on cue. In Washington in the fall of 1953 in a mistake called "Crazy October," she laid waste Richard Nixon and Gov. Faubus while guest of honor at the Women's National Press Club. Her epithets popped up in newspapers all the way from Bangor to San Diego. Following Democratic luncheon there, she shared page 1 of the NY Daily News in a pose with Harry Truman, thus became the envy of her sorority.

Though pressagentry is a treacherous trade, fraught with peril and mischance, it fascinates me. Those sensitive to shock and hysteria, to meglomania and stage mothers, should avoid it. They'll be happier amid saner surroundings. But it is stimulating adventure for anyone who doesn't mind living on a slack wire, who thrives on confusion, and who can remain above the battle when his comrades go berserk.

Ego, Yes; Indecision, Often; But Love That Hollywood

By PATRICIA JOHNSON
(Associate Editor, Gold Medal Books)

In 1955 a nice paradox occurred in a paperback house when its two bestselling books turned out to be Polly Adler's "A House Is Not a Home" and Monsignor Fulton J. Sheen's "The Eternal Galilean." Whatever the cause for the public's simultaneous demands for sin and salvation and where else but in paperbacks could you purchase each for a mere 35c?), there was no question at Popular Library, publisher of both books, that this peculiar little twist was a highly profitable one.

Pat Johnson

It's too much to hope that soft-cover houses will forever profit from paradoxes, but recently paperbacks have been making money for themselves and for movie companies by way of a new and booming twist—a complete reversal in the procedure of movie tie-ins.

Traditionally a book would appear in hardcover, make a name for itself on the bestseller lists and then go on the block for sale to theatrical producers, motion picture producers and paperback publishers. Throughout the whole process the hardcover publisher was the seller, and so long as contract terms were not violated, strict attention was not necessarily paid to who was doing what when.

Now the cart is being put before the horse—and with solid results. Motion picture companies with no more—and often much less—than a rought script in hand are being besieged by droves of paperback editors vying for the right to novelize their original scenarios. And, contrary to the helterskelter planning of the old days, timing is of the utmost importance.

The result of the switch seems to be that everyone is making hay. To be sure, the initial amount the soft cover house pays the film company for the novelization rights varies from nothing to—at the most—very little in the Hollywood scale of measurements. Sophisticated film producers look at tie-in books primarily as exploitation aids, not as sources of direct income. In fact, the new Screen Writers Guild contract calls for the screenplay writer to receive one-third of the royalties paid by the publisher; the novelist receives the other two-thirds, which leaves the producer holding the bag. But the bag is full of valuable intangibles, or intangible values.

How It Works

What the publisher does for the film concern is create a nationwide market, a popular anticipation of a film before it would ordinarily be more than a vague glimmer by the public consciousness. There are approximately 100,000 outlets for paperback books in the United States. In newsstands, drugstores, railroad stations, airports, hotel lobbies and bookstores across the country thousands of copies of the novelization suddenly blossom forth—usually one or two months prior to the film's release. If a book has been novelized from a screenplay, the title is always the same as the movie's, and ideally, this should be the case in all tie-ins—so that the book will automatically be associated in the mind of the potential buyer with the film.

But this isn't always feasible when the film is made from a hardcover book. For instance, a Dell reprint called "The Green Gage Summer" is now a motion picture called "Loss of Innocence"; by prearrangement with the hard cover publisher, the Dell edition must retain the book's original title. "Aimez-Vous Brahms," by Francoise Sagan was made into the Ingrid Bergman movie, "Goodbye Again," but the Bantam reprint carries the first title because the hardcover book had had such a lively life of its own under that title.

Generally speaking though, publishers cooperate in keying their titles to the picture's—even to changing the name of a reissue of a book already published. The Rock Hudson-Kirk Douglas western, "The Last Sunset," was based on a Gold Medal book called "Sundown at Crazy Horse," but when the picture came out, the book was reissued under the movie title which had undergone five different—and to the publisher, hair-raising—changes before the film was finally released.

More Ballyhoo

Another method of bringing the reader's attention to the forthcoming film is to use stills on the cover of the book, such as Gold Medal is doing with its novelization of Warners' forthcoming "The Couch" by Robert Bloch. Bloch, incidentally, is one of a rare breed. He wrote the screenplay, then adapted it into novel form; most screenwriters don't publish novels.

Sometimes credits are also listed on the cover so that the book buyer and prospective moviegoer knows not only who is in the film, but who produced it, directed it, released it, and who wrote the screenplay. There seems to be some disagreement, however, about how much good these credits do. Motion picture producers and their publicists like to see lots of names on a cover; most publishers feel the longer the list, the worse the book does.

Truck banners, posters, streamers, special display racks and other promotional material distributed by the publisher help plug both the book and the movie. Close cooperation between Pocket Books and the Mirisches has resulted in some really effective displays for "West Side Story." And similar mutual back-scratching between Fawcett and Allied Artists is resulting in a great deal of "See-the-movie, read-the-book" promotion on Sam Bronston's "El Cid."

Of course, paperback houses are not charities. The publisher reaps his rewards in a tie-in, too. Unquestionably a novelization is going to benefit from any advance publicity done by the producing studio. A good book will sell better if people have already been familiarized with its title, or if the cover can boast the advantage of a handsome photograph or dramatic likeness of a topnotch star. The clever, catchy comedy called "Pillow Talk," published in 1959 by Gold Medal, was not harmed by its Kodachrome cover of Rock Hudson and Doris Day. "Psycho," which sold a mere 4,000 copies in hardcover, went back to press three times and sold over 500,000 copies in Crest's soft-cover edition, which featured the jagged, broken lettering of the title that had appeared on the hardcover edition and on the ads and trailers for the picture.

Unfortunately, the publisher also collects his share of headaches. Not the least of his trials is the strange megalomania that sometimes afflicts Hollywood titans. One paperback house reports that it recently contracted to do novelization of John Doe's production of a movie we'll call XYZ—based on the exploits of a similarly named historical figure. The cover art was completed, proper credits were listed, arrangements were made for the publisher to use the motion picture's logotype for the title of the book. Everything was all set to go, but when the plates were made and the cover was submitted to producer John Doe for approval, the publisher was informed that for all intents and purposes the actual legal title of the book was not "XYZ" but "John Doe XYZ." The publisher remade his plates.

Another publishers' problem is the difficulty of dealing with studio representatives, or producers, or talent agents who are jealous of the credits on books—credits for actors, directors, screenwriters, etc. One book came close to not hitting the stands last spring because the two major actors who were appearing in the movie version had to appear by contract with the motion picture distributor, in precisely the same proportion on all illustrative material connected with the film. On the proposed cover of the book a scene from the picture one actor was a fraction smaller than the other—and there wasn't enough time to break the plate and do another cover. Alarmed at the thought of offending the "smaller" actor, the picture company's lawyers issued an injunction against release of the cover. Some 200,000 copies of the book would probably be yellowing in the warehouse now if an editor hadn't taken the matter in hand and sent a telegram explaining the trouble to the renowned and outspoken actor the studio thought would feel slighted. Within hours, the actor (who had known nothing about the book prior to the telegram) called the head of the studio, and the cover was okayed.

A far more frequent plague to publishers is a movie concern's predilection for changing titles and release dates on the spur of the moment. A novelization on sale, say, in March should, for best sales results and full publicity value for the film, be followed up by the appearance of the movie one to two months later. But if someone suddenly decides to hold the release back for the Christmas season, the publisher is left with 200,000 copies of a book distributed around the country doing little good because all its impact is wasted.

why we choose to vote for one political party or another. Why draw the line at that? Poets and writers have always involved themselves up to the neck in politics and political action, what's so special about an actor?

People working in a studio, theatre or variety have responsibilities towards the people they work with, and the management they work for. Everything in me hates the idea of breaking a contracted promise by doing something which will disturb and cause loss to the people involved with me in the theatre. It is my duty to be loyal to the theatre. I try to be so. I want to be so; but when the inevitable clash comes between my work in the theatre and action I feel I must take, together with many other people, towards achieving nuclear disarmament, then I must choose the second.

What would happen if I chose career at the expense of my convictions? I should be unhappy and, if I were unhappy, I could not enjoy my work, anyway. I don't say I would be any less effective as an actress, but without enjoyment of the job there is no satisfaction in the arduous profession of the theatre. Sometimes I have been asked whether my political views affect the parts I accept? The answer is "No."

I would certainly take a role diametrically opposed to my own views, providing that the case was fairly put, so that people could be persuaded to think about and discuss the problem. Of course, the situation is far easier for an actress than for a playwright. However depressed she is with world affairs she can switch to, say, Kate in "The Taming of the Shrew," for a couple of hours without difficulty. It must be far more difficult for a writer with strong beliefs not to find his work colored by them.

I am convinced that it is absolutely essential to use every possible means to fight the potential Bomb horror. As an actress I can make a reasonably decent speech, and as a "name" I make some impact at demonstrations. I am sure that everybody who cares about our future must help, and that goes for people in the world of entertainment, too. I have just appeared in one anti-bomb film.

Many people in my profession have joined together and formed a Campaign for the Nuclear Disarmament Stage Club and last month we staged a revue, "Everybody Sit," which was put on in London on a Sunday for the club funds. The cast included Sybil Thorndike, Maj Zetterling, Constance Cummings, Kenneth Williams and other members of the cast of "One Over The Eight," "Fings Ain't Wot They Used T'Be" and "Beyond the Fringe."

I mention this show, and those names, to prove that, within the theatre, there is a large, responsible body of leading members of the profession who refuse to subscribe to the oldfashioned, bigoted theory that show business and politics don't mix. They do. They must.

I REMEMBER MANANA

By SIG HERZIG

Madrid.

I woke up with the clear glareless light streaming in on me and wondered what had happened to the smog. Then I remembered I was in Madrid where it was manana while it was still yesterday in Hollywood. I was there to write the screenplay for "Operation Sevilla" for Rudolph Medina. Norman McLeod was slated to direct. I remembered when I had first met the director of "Topper," "Road to Rio," "Paleface" and other comedies. It was on the old Christie Comedy lot, where we both started our careers. Only he was a cartoonist then, who illustrated the silent titles and his cartoons were often funnier than the pictures. I remember discussing our plans for manana together. He wanted to become a director, but Al Christie, who needed an experienced cartoonist more than an untried director, kept putting him off. I wanted to graduate from the tworeelers I was writing to features, which was like going from extra to leading man which only happened in the pictures themselves.

Mort Blumenstock, the press-agent, got me the break. He told a producer friend at Columbia that I had just turned out six reels in three weeks. Since he didn't mention that he had just added up the three tworeelers I had written, I got a feature to do—"The Lone Wolf's Daughter." Unfortunately it was one of the last silent pictures. Talk came in with a sonic boom and it was just as hard for a silent writer to get a job on a "talkie" as it was to go from tworeelers to features.

So I went to New York to prove myself as a dialog writer. I started out by writing sketches for Lew Fields' "Vanderbilt Revue." There was a beautiful classic dancer in the show by the name of Francesca Bragiotti who hankered for some lines. That was a pretty big jump, too. But I managed to write her into a sketch with Lulu McConnell. I met Francesca in Madrid a few weeks ago. She is now Mrs. John Cabot Lodge, wife of the former American Ambassador to Spain, a great and gracious lady who is still in show business. As the wife of a prominent public figure she has to be "on" most of the time.

After "The Vanderbilt Revue" there was "The Third Americana." I worked on the sketches with J. P. McEvoy. Johnny Mercer was around the show doctoring some lyrics. He came from a wealthy Savannah family, but now he was on his own, making it the hard way as a budding lyric writer. His wife Ginger would provide him with carfare and lunch money every morning. But on the way to the theatre, he'd forget he was broke and hand out dimes to all the panhandlers that came up to him, and there were plenty in those days. So he always had a very light lunch. Ironically, the hit song of the show was "Brother Can You Spare A Dime?", but instead of Johnny, Yip Harburg and Jay Gorney invented it.

Having proved I could write dialog, I was put on the SuperChief and rushed back to Hollywood and a job at Paramount. Since I was now typed as a Broadway sketch-writer, the studio assigned a collaborator to help me write "the left side of the script." In those days this was where the action and the camera angles were described. The right side was for the dialog. Although I knew everything about the camera from booms to zooms, I played it straight. It was a big office and I was lonesome.

From Paramount I went to Warners on an eight-week contract that lasted for five years. My first collaborator there was Jerry Wald. Jerry didn't attempt to teach me anything about the left side of the script, but I did learn how to read "upside down" from him. This was a way of reading the inter-office memos on a producer's desk when they were turned away from you. In that way you could find out what stories the studio was looking for and maybe come up with one of them the next morning. I often wonder if Jerry now has his inter-office memos written in code.

As my five-year tour of duty at Warners was coming to an end, I noticed that a lot of the old screen-writers were falling by the wayside. Playwrights were the thing. They were bringing them out in droves from New York. As a mere sketchwriter I couldn't qualify. Besides I already was in Hollywood.

So I sat down and wrote a play called "Vickie" in six weeks, and four weeks later I was on my way back to New York with Frank Mandel to open it. It closed almost as quickly. Usually an author blames a flop on the cast. But what could I say after Mandel came up with Jose Ferrer, Uta Hagen, Mildred Dunnock, Taylor Holmes and Red Buttons? Renee Carroll, the redheaded hatchick at Sardi's, wanted to see the show, but when I offered her passes she refused them. She said the show needed support and she was going to make her escort pay for the best seats in the house. She only accepted free tickets for hits! When "Bloomer Girl," which I had written with Fred Saidy with a score by Yip Harburg and Harold Arlen, opened a year later, I sent her complimentary tickets for opening night. She must have sensed a big hit because she asked for another ticket for her cousin from Syracuse. I gave her mine and stood up. Years later when I met her in Beverly Hills as the wife of Lou Shoncit, the ticketbroker and backer of nothing but hits, she told me she didn't have a cousin in Syracuse. In fact she didn't know anyone there.

After "Bloomer Girl," Hollywood sent for me again. Now that I'm in Madrid perhaps I'll get the call once more. This time they'll probably supply me with an interpreter to help me with the English dialog on the left side of the script.

New Film Spots

lation has decreased by 70,558 while the count for all of Cook County has gone up 560,132. This has been despite a continuing influx into the city of lower socio-economic level southern whites, Negroes and Puerto Ricans, indicating that the flow to the outskirts is predominantly middle class is greater than even the figures show.

Of the seven new suburban hardtops on the drawing board or under construction, six of them are set for locations in or near shopping centres. Says Kohlberg: "The shopping centres are associated with an increasingly auto-oriented society, and with astute merchandising and I think that these factors also spell out the future of picture exhibition. The era of the no-parking-area opulent picture palace is over. Our theatres will be handsome, efficient and accessible."

This is not to say that new houses will be bandboxes. The Golf Mill theatre (which broke ground in November) seats 1,800, and the Hillside theatre will have a 1,500 capacity. Both are located in shopping centres. However, the money saved on marble staircases and ornate staircases will go for other customer lures. For instance, the Golf Mill has such accoutrements as a 40 ft. by 40 ft. television lounge, free coffee, an infra-red heated canopy extending eight feet in front of the theatre, and two glass-enclosed soundproof rooms for restless children.

The one new hardtop not located in a shopping centre will be constructed during 1962 by Lubliner & Trinz, veteran Chi theatre owners, and will be located in the northern suburbs. General manager Bruce Trinz said that his company sees no necessity for building the theatre in a shopping centre as long as plentiful parking is available.

The formula for the location of new theatres—population plus parking plus money—shapes as the key to motion picture exhibition in the Chicago area for the foreseeable future, and this means locating in the suburbs where all three factors are available and increasing. Without the caution inspired by television competition it's possible that some of the money now available for the suburban houses might have been used at an earlier date for smaller and more efficient nabe houses.

Anti-Show Biz and/or Literary and/or Property Rights Laws Can Be Altered If There's Enough Action Taken

By HARRIET F. PILPEL

Those of us who are lawyers are duly appreciative of the fact that those of us who are clients call us up when they want to know what the law is:— How far can you go in criticizing a living person? A dead person? Suppose you use a name for a fictional character and it turns out there is a real and not so dissimilar person by the same name? Etcetera and so forth. And after all, clients should call lawyers on just such questions. That's what lawyers are trained for, and that's how we make our living.

But it does puzzle lawyers some of the time that you clients—especially clients in the literary and entertainment fields—do not have more awareness, in fact, in many cases, any awareness of the fact that it is they who write the laws, attorneys only interpret them.

All lawyers have often had the experience of having a client try to talk him out of what he honestly thinks, the law is with "but that's ridiculous," "that can't be libelous," "if I can't print or show that, then we're living in a dictatorship already."

The correct answer for the client to give the lawyer at that point is "OK—you don't like what the law is on this subject, change it."

Actually there are few laws in the entertainment field—or for that matter—in any other field that clients, and the ones hit by the law, can't change if they put effort to it.

It is true, of course, that the Constitution itself says thou shalt not in certain areas. No matter how much one wants to have a law saying no more paperbacks with pictures of semi-dressed women on the covers, the chances are the law wouldn't stand up because we do (thank heaven) have constitutional guarantees against abridgement of the press and even pictures of semi-dressed ladies are a form of communication.

But leaving aside the area of constitutional guarantees—there is no—repeat no—law that can't be changed if enough of those on whom it has an impact want to change it.

Usage of Names

Item: Do you think that you should have the right to use the names and pictures of actual persons in a book, movie, show, song or broadcast? Should it matter whether the use is to convey factual data or is fictional in character? Does it matter whether you have the person's permission and whether that permission is in writing? Suppose neither the person's name nor his picture is used but facts which point inescapably to him are the basis for, say, a feature film? Like the story of the first man to fly the Atlantic solo, told in such a way that everyone thinks of one particular person but some of the film doesn't "fit" and some of it may be libelous? And like that? This whole subject matter, which goes under the general heading of privacy, is wide open—the courts throughout the country are groping for satisfactory solutions as ever new and more puzzling questions arise.

Or let's take the question of the effect of our tax laws on creative people—writers, composers, artists, performers and the like—there's no question but that these groups get the worst of all tax worlds—especially when they're freelance rather than employed. Their product, regardless of its value, can never put them in a capital gains position. Generally speaking they have no pension plans. Their ability to save anything, against the diminution of their earning power that is apt to come sooner or later as they get older or as their creative well-springs become temporarily or permanently dry, is nonexistent.

Patent Boys Did All Right!

Some years ago inventors were in substantially the same boat. But the patent boys got together and marched on Washington. The result: today those who get patents are the most preferred group tax wise our economy. Whereas, other groups have to sweat and strain to achieve that lovely 25% capital gains tax, and whereas, the advantages of that tax are denied altogether to the creators of our copyrights (except possibly after they are dead) the creators of our patents are entitled to capital gains treatment with a minimum of effort and tax planning on their part.

There is evidence that people in the Treasury Department are conscious of the enormous injustice the present tax laws inflict on copyright creators. They would, I think, lend a sympathetic ear to proposals for reform. But, of course, if we don't make any—if we grouse but don't come up with any specific proposals, whom can we blame except ourselves?

Or take the field of copyright reform? Do you like the highly technical rules on the copyright notice which makes publishing and producing like walking on eggs when it comes to technical compliance with the Copyright Act? Do you think it's fair that no payment is made by anyone to anyone for the use of copyrighted music in jukeboxes? Do you think it makes sense in this one world of ours for United States publishers and authors to be precluded from printing their books abroad (no matter how much better or cheaper the books could be produced there) on pain of permanent loss of their U.S. copyright? No, of course, you don't like any of these things—you can't.

But what are you doing to change them? It won't do any good to call up your lawyer and argue with him. He agrees with you that in many respects "the law is a ass," as Mr. Dickens said. But he didn't make the laws you object to—the ones you try so hard to argue him out of, as if he did.

Keep Nagging the Solons

There is a sign on one of those western superhighways leading to Las Vegas, Nevada (or at least there was) reading, "Don't just sit there—nag your husband." Well, the same goes for you—anyway part of it does. Don't just sit there if you don't like what the law is—join with others similarly situated (as we lawyers put it) and do something about it.

On the privacy level, it is mostly the state courts and the state legislatures that write the final tickets. If you feel strongly about any phase of this, get in touch with them.

As far as taxes are concerned, the U.S. Treasury Department is not blind to rank injustice when it is called to their attention. But they've got a lot of problems and if you want them to pay attention to yours, you have to address them specifically and give them specific and telling data.

And as to copyright—well, you couldn't be in a better position than you are right at this moment. The U.S. Copyright Office has just brought forth a comprehensive—and excellent—program for Copyright Law revision. All it has to do is to get through Congress. And

Clara Bow's Underwear

A Reminiscence

By JOSEPH MILL BROWN

After living abroad, it was a pleasure to return to my home in New Jersey just in time to learn of the splendid job being done by the County Prosecutor in protecting children from having to read Henry Miller's filthy classic, "Tropic of Cancer." I wish we had similarly-alert meatheads in my youth. They might have protected me from having to go see filthy movies, every Saturday and Sunday matinee. I might have turned out to be less of a gayblade had I not been exposed constantly to the tantalizing sight of Clara Bow's underwear.

In the recent cinematic histories, hardly a masterpiece can qualify as definitive without husky portions allocated to the sirens and the sexpots, and the luscious attractions of the "It" Girl herself, Clara Bow. She was gaudy and bawdy and lusty, living the celluloid life that made the fictionalized F. Scott Fitzgerald counterparts resemble Inca Virgins. The pictorial anthologies show her with a round face, wet bangs, laughing, flashing eyes, a Cupid's bow of a mouth and a flat (as was the fashion) but attractive figure. In most of the stills, she seems to be clothed in only a chemise.

Through the years I've had many "remember when" conversations with friends about Clara Bow, but I find it strange that the only things my friends don't remember is the one thing I, for one, recall most vividly—her underwear.

I won't make apologies for my friends. For the most part they are racetrack touts, poolroom hustlers and satyrs. They are not the type of people I would have in my house. Yet they do not remember Clara Bow's underwear. They do, however, insist that they remember a lot of things about Clara Bow's movies that I don't remember. This stumped me until I realized, one day, that these are men much older than I. While I was a fairly-innocent, pre-puberty youth, they were already dirty-minded adolescents.

Incompatible

With them, life had to be heavy-handed, or nothing at all. Buck Jones (or was it Jack Hoxie?) and his white horse registered over Garbo's haunting eyelids. Douglas Fairbanks' acrobatics carried more zip than Ernst Lubitsch's cinematic subtleties (if they ever knew who Lubitsch was). They were the type who gave you two-to-one odds (6c to 3c) that Baby Leroy would outlast Maurice Chevalier.

Before I realized we were incompatable, I suffered boiling insults from my "friends." (I was too young and insecure to give them up and try the gang on the next block.) It was impossible to talk to them of beauty, and love, and happiness. Poor kids, there was so little of it in their own homes, how could they recognize it if they saw it?

When you are that young, it kills you to pretend that you prefer a Red Grange football serial to Nancy Carroll's passionate twitchings. And, yet, how beautifully she twitched. Was it obscene to revel in Billie Dove's fantastic beauty, just because she spent half of her pictures reclining about in white satin kimonas? "In those days," as Norma Desmond (Gloria Swanson) observed in Billy Wilder's "Sunset Boulevard," they had faces.

And even if they didn't, are the limits of beauty proscribed? For many years one of the vaudeville staples at Loew's Pitkin, in the Brownsville section of Brooklyn had been the girlie revues of Nils T. Granlund ("NTG's Sweethearts" was the billing). The shrewd Granny always made it a point to hire one or two specimens of local talent—certain insurance for packing the galleries. For the last two or three years, the neighborhood celebrity had been a statuesque blond trappe named Alicia J. who forsook all learning after two years of highschool when fate crowned her Queen of the Eastern Parkway Block Party of 1929. This led to further triumphs, viz., Miss Belly Lox of 1930 for the exploitation of a new appetizing store, and Miss Sands in the Pands—the same year—at the opening of Steeplechase.

When the word came down to the cellars and alleys of Brownsville that Alicia had hit the big-time, all craps and rummy games came to a halt as the neighborhood turned out to root on the local girl who had went and showed them. I remember trembling with joy in the darkened theatre as the lights came up at the end of the movie and the orchestra played the overture. NTG shuffled out, wearing a party hat and blowing a paper horn, and then the curtain rose on a long line of girls blanketing the stage with the usual NTG costumes—a little gauze there and a smile up here. And then there was a humming noise progressing to a ripple of muffled shouts as the audience searched the stage and finally identified Alicia.

Memories

A surprise awaited us. NTG had arranged an impromptu beauty contest. (It was "impromptu" at every show.) He merely traversed the line of showgirls, pausing to hold his hand over the head of each doll. The one who drew most applause was the acknowledged "winner." In my very young eyes, it was an accident that Alicia was the girl at the end, but of course no accident that she had won. For it seemed to me she looked the way Helen of Troy must have looked—or, at least, Vilma Banky on the day she married Rod La Rocque.

At the end of the show, we

French (Not Jealous, They Insist) Study Whys of Italy's Advance In America

By GENE MOSKOWITZ

Paris.

An internationally-minded French film producer shakes his head about the impact of France upon America during 1961. He is truthful and realistically informed, in saying that Italy was dominant during the year just ended. Against that, however, the prospects for French product in the U.S. during 1962 is visibly brighter.

The point is worth stressing that Parisians familiar with cinema developments are contrasting the gratifying progress of French features in other areas of the world while seemingly slumping in America. There lies its best chance of international revenues and prestige.

The situation is perhaps not as bad as some view it. Partly this is the liquidation of the false spurt known as the "new wave" which contributed a sense of vitality to Paris studios some few years ago. But a great number of the features made at that period by eager beaver youths have either flopped at the boxoffice or never been released at all.

Day Before Yesterday

The best of the "new wave" producers may be credited with quickening the pulse of French production. They had a refreshing impertinence, a kind of nothing-to-lose daring which created films of real impact. One must remain grateful for, say, "The 400 Blows," "Black Orpheus" and "Hiroshima Mon Amour."

Nor should it be forgotten that one girl by herself created a rebirth of French pictures, namely Brigitte Bardot. She is still making pictures, though the first sensation is now history as with the first sensation of the separate phenomenon of the "wave."

An offbeat little comedy like "The Joker" did alright as did a conventional episode pic like "The French Women and Love." But in 1961 the French definitely lagged behind Italian power in U.S. arties and subsequents.

So what happened? Much self-scrutiny in Paris. Boils down to a new awareness that the French industry is still basically insular and still making films primarily for its own peoples plus French-speaking former colonies, etc. Yet it is extremely rare, almost impossible, for a French release to amortize itself on its own market.

This does not mean slavish emulation of other countries, for a good national picture can usually be a good international attraction. But it does mean France must keep up with current trends. The Italians have been more international market-minded.

It is usually added here in Paris that there is no jealousy about the Italian boom. It is a true creative renaissance, plus the luck of cashing in on a spate of biblical and ancient spear-and-sandal quickie costumers. The French right now are not heading that way. It is true that actioners are made here too. But they are usually too elegant and concerned with talky intrigue and historical pageantry.

Too French?

French costumers usually do well at home. Top grossers this past year include Jean Marais' swashbuckling "Miracle of the Wolves" and "The Capitaine Francasse" plus still another version of that old workhorse "The Three Musketeers." These have yet to be shown in stateside playoff.

Pioneer Abel Gance's "Austerlitz" had some fine battle scenes but too much inside court intrigue, and though 20th-Fox is supposed to have it there has been no word of pending U.S. release. The big scale "La Fayette" is also waiting for Yank takers as well as the more serious medieval love pic "The Princess of Cleves." French are apparently pining for a Joe Levine to jazz up their more elegant actioners.

Too many French films are replete with allusions and comedics hard to sell in U.S. There is considerable curiosity respecting Robert Dhery's easygoing situation comedy "La Belle Americaine" in the light of his long exposure to the American mentality. Also being watched is the 1959 pic, "Les Liaisons Dangereuses" which will get the Astor treatment given Italy's "La Dolce Vita." Like that opus this one delves into decadent high life.

Exterior Shooting

The "Wave" directors' penchant for shooting in real surroundings has led to some studio rental lulls but most space still seems filled. However, there are video inroads into studios as well as the possibility of several being torn down to make way for housing developments which in turn could bring on more on-the-spot shooting.

Workers think this will lead to eventual unemployment. The promised French "Hollywood on the Riviera" is still in the planning stages. Yank production has always been less in France than elsewhere in Europe. It is felt that costs are higher than in Italy without all the facilities and especially the milder climate.

Though the City of Paris is considered a veritable film set it is used usually for just that. Yanks come in for exteriors mainly. However Darryl Zanuck, now a resident, has done several pix here and is now tying up a whole studio with seven sound stages for several months with his massive "The Longest Day" (20th).

"Paris Blues" was made in its entirety here. Jules Dassin, who made French features and now does English speaking ones under a United Artists contract, did his interiors for his recent "Phaedra" in Paris, while longtime resident Anatole Litvak made "Goodbye Again" (UA) in Paris and just started another.

The French have turned to sketch, or multi-episode scripts, as their international box office bid after the success of "French Woman and Love." "Famous Loves," with an all star cast, is doing biz and winding are "The Seven Capital Sins," done mostly by "Wave" directors in contrast to the oldsters who did "French Woman," "The Parisian Women," "Love is 20 Years Old" and "Crime Does Not Pay."

Raoul Levy is making a French blockbuster bid with his long delayed $4,500,000 "Marco Polo" now set to begin in January, 1962. Yank majors are still backing French pix, both for local and worldwide marts. Metro has a company setup with producer Jacques Bar through which came "Bridge to the Sun." Also put money into the latest B.B. opus, "A Very Private Affair" via producer Christine Gouzel-Renal.

Yank continental offices are in Paris and still count a great deal on Paris openings for prestige reflections around Europe. But French producers, if production is holding up and they are still winning laurels at fim fests with offbeat pix, see U.S. playoff progress again eluding them.

Yank stars rarely settle in Paris as they seem to do in Rome. One exception was Jean Seberg who revived her lagging Yank career here. Simone Signoret and Yves Montand have become Yank names and thus could be an asset to French films, but, besides the inevitable B.B., French are also stymied by the uneven U.S. reactions to such top stars as Fernandel, Jean Gabin and a Yank who became a star in France, Eddie Constantine.

"Stay very close to me darling because without you, I am not alive!"

Grandma's Sermon In The Valley

celebrated actress Jane Russell.

"Mother" Russell is spiritual guide not only to her own brood, but to a core of Hollywoodites including David Brian, Rhonda Fleming, Colleen Townsend, Dale Evans, Roy Rogers and the Ronald Reagans.

She specializes in helping Hollywood up-and-outs as opposed to down-and-outs. Up-and-outs are people financially up in the world but spiritually down.

Explains "Mother Russell": "Show business is so highpressured it keeps peoples lives upside down and they begin taking things to keep them going—pills, liquor, drugs, anything to keep them up."

A handsome gray-haired firm-backed, no-nonsense woman, "Mother" Russell represents a reservoir of strength in the Hollywood community which is constantly in need of irrigation. "She gets to the point of her sermons with sledgehammer force," says Alyce Canfield, one of the congregation and author herself of a book called, "God In Hollywood."

In a community where psychiatry has become a religion and confessions are made from the couch, it's surprising that the elemental and basic religious discussions of "Mother" Russell have become so popular.

Although some of the established churches in the film community are heavily attended, more and more Hollywood folk are forming religious discussion groups of their own.

On Monday evenings at the convention hall of the Hollywood Knickerbocker Hotel, more than 150 young actors and actresses attend meetings of the Hollywood Christian Group.

Ty Hardin, young Warner contract player now starring in "The Chapman Report," is president of the group which, he says, was founded 15 years ago "by people in the movie industry who felt there was a place for God in the hearts of the people here." Hardin is president of another religious group called the Hollywood Life Group which he organized. HLG meets on Friday nights. Bob Turnbull, Peter Brown, Will Hutchins and Yvonne Lime are regulars in the group which has 200 members.

Hardin's Credo

"People in Hollywood are getting more God-conscious," says Hardin, pointing to himself as an example. "Two years ago you couldn't get me to speak about God," he said. "I would talk about myself all day but never about Him. Then I came face to face with the greatest tragedy of my life—I lost my family and wife because of my way of life."

Hardin, a tall, handsome 32-year-old former bronc rider and pro football player, who served three years in Korea as a lieutenant in the Army, says he has made a great flop of his life. "I've been married twice, have four children, but I had no idea of what the responsibilities of marriage meant," he said.

In "The Chapman Report," a Kinsey look at a Los Angeles community, Hardin plays a football player who makes brutal love to a married woman. "Before I took this part, I spent many nights in meditation," he said. "I asked the Lord not to give me the part if He didn't want me to have it. I have the part now and I feel that I am in this picture for a purpose."

Hardin's sincerity is impossible to doubt. He spends 4—6 hours a day studying the Bible, is booked many months in advance to speak on Christianity throughout the U.S.

Not all of the religious activities in Los Angeles is carried on in such a high spiritual plane as that represented by the groups of "Mother" Russell and Hardin.

This area has long been a fertile campsite for the odd, weird, flamboyant of cults.

Other Cults

Members of religious groups who dress in white robes, preach in Pershing Square (the heart of Los Angeles) while brown-robed barefoot monks can be seen on daily pilgrimages up the Sunset Strip.

L.A. newspapers carry ads every Sunday for religious groups offering everything from salvation through diet, to prosperity through worship. A mail-order cult with a symbol (circle with a dot in the centre) instead of a name promises inner peace and harmony with herbs, juices, health foods and residence in planned garden cities.

At the Church of Modern Philosophy Dr. William King preaches reincarnation to believers attracted by the ads which read, "Do You Dare Be Different?" The Sunship Assembly meets in an abandoned movie house where its leaders sing such hyms as "I Am The Spout From Which Glory Comes Out," accompanied by an electric guitar. The AKASHIC Science Group is still searching for the lost city of Atlantis. Dr. Plunkett of the Rainbow Revival Church has a mailorder business in blessed handkerchiefs.

There are also about 40 different groups specializing in black magic. Naturally they hold secret meetings with weird rituals, sex symbols and strange potions. There is also the New Era Experiment which deals in white magic to offset the black variety.

There is also a local chapter of the Vedenta Society whose members include Aldous Huxley, philosopher Gerald Heard, and the poet Christopher Isherwood. Unlike most other groups this one doesn't solicit converts because it believes people pass through a succession of lives and if they don't join this time around, they will the next.

Not everyone seeking religious experience and identification is a member of a group. Diane Varsi, self-exiled star of "Peyton Place," left Hollywood to examine her inner being in the solitude of Sausalito, Calif. A Hollywood newsman visited Miss Varsi recently to ask if she planned to return to the Sinema City. Miss Varsi shook her head and warned that one day fire and holocaust would fall on Hollywood. When the reporter returned to Hollywood he found his home burned to the ground along with 450 others in the great fire.

Queen Brushes Show Biz In New Year Honors List; BBC Execs Cop Awards

London.

Showbiz personalities fared poorly in the Queen's New Year's Honors List. There were no awards for any of the topbrass and most of the decorations went to execs in the BBC.

Marie Rambert was made a Dame of the British Empire for her services to the ballet and John Michael Pritchard, conductor and musical director of the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic, becomes a Commander of the British Empire. Another CBE has been awarded to James Henry Francis Monahan, controller of the BBC's European Services.

Other BBC officials to be honored included Robert Gordon Thomson Gildard, head of programs in Scotland (Order of the British Empire); William Gregory MacDonald, head of Central European Services, OBE; John Cedric Wilfred Knight, senior assistant of the finance division (Member of the British Empire); Margaret Winifred McCall, assistant in charge facilities unit, MBE; Harry Alex Masters, engineer in charge, Daventry (MBE); John Harry Ridley, Head of Engineering Secretariat (MBE).

Among other awards was an OBE to Thomas Edward Brownsdon, head of regional services for the Independent Television Authority; an OBE to Donald McKay Elliot, director of the Scottish Film Council, and similar honors to two singers, Parry Jones and Anne Pollak.

James Shand receives an MBE for his contribution to Scottish comedy dancing and Mrs. Mona Cicely Tatham also gets the MBE for her work as assistant director of music to the Arts Council. G. H. Watson of the Gramophone Co. (HMV and EMI) is made a member of the Royal Victorian Order (5th class).

THE WRITER AS CENSOR

By JOHN ROEBURT

A more potent censor than the Pecksniffs and the Grundys is the writer himself. The index of Banned Books merely tells the external story—the less visible but larger cost to literature (and artistic freedom) is in those books banished from mind, never written, or aborted in manuscript, or produced but locked away in secret.

Self-imposed censorship and self-inhibition is the commonplace—the Nabokovs and Henry Millers are phenomenal, anomalous to the scrivening breed.

Why these self-restraints—the paradox of the writer in virtual alliance with the censor, against himself? The factors or forces, motivating writers can generally be said to be: the risks of obscenity charges and prosecution, the fear of self-exposure, and a certain sensitivity to the mores of the community.

Real and neurotic fears of prosecution is as centuries-old as the actuality of systematic literary censorship. Yesteryear's writers took example from such celebrated cases as the imprisonment of Daniel Defoe, the creator of Robinson Crusoe, for his ironical work "The Shortest Way With Dissenters"; the mutilation (ears cut off in the pillory) and life-imprisonment of William Prynne for his "Histrio-Mastix, The Player's Scourge"; the "obscene libel" charges and suppression of Emile Zola, Herman Sudermann, Huysman, Dreiser.

The modern writer takes caution and even fright, from classic censorship cases that bedeviled such literary greats as Joyce, D. H. Lawrence, Cabell. The case of Mark Twain is poignant proof of literary genius being stifled and emasculated through fear of censorship and censure. This fear—become almost obsessive — made Twain (Samuel L Clemens) daily for years over the advisability of publishing "What Is Man?"

Current area-censorship across the breadth of the United States and an operating blacklist affect such book titles as O'Hara's "Farmer's Hotel," Salinger's "The Catcher In The Rye," Uris' "Battle Cry," Farrell's "A World I Never Made." The ban here and there in America is equally upon Faulkner, Hemingway, Dos Passos, along with the noxious trash produced by non-writers supplying the smut and hard-core pornography markets.

The writer's choice of material and language is inevitably affected, inevitably depressed by the censorial attrition against any and all books. That ancient canard that being banned in Boston insures the success of the literary work, is very ancient and very false. Today's reality is such, that a book banned in any geography, simply shows proportionately fewer sales for the limits of its distribution, with a consequent financial loss for the writer.

The Omnipotent Bogeyman

For the great majority of working novelists, the Censor is an awesome Presence in his studio. The long list of Do-Nots burn neon-bright in the writer's fears. Imagination conjures up that Tribunal judging his punishment for those forbidden concepts, sentences and words.

Even so bold and anarchic a contemporary as Norman Mailer admits to a degree of self-censorship—this during—the actual creative process. Mailer's conjuration of a wroth censor is told in the following passage excerpted from his book, "Advertisements To Myself": "Every now and then, I would have the nightmare of wondering . . . that The Deer Park was likely to be brought up for prosecution as obscene . . . that if the book were banned, it could sink from sight. And so, I was beginning to avoid new lines in The Deer Park that were legally doubtful, and once in a while, like a gambler hedging his bet, I toned down individual sentences in the book."

A historical analogy to the Mailer dilemma, was the case of the writer-philosopher Rene Descartes, made afraid by the censorial condemnation of Galileo, shelved a completed treatise he was about to dispatch to the printer. As Descartes explained his self-proscription: "When I learned that persons to whom I greatly defer, had condemned a certain doctrine in physics, published a short time previously by Galileo . . . this led me to fear lest among my own doctrines and writings, some one might be found in which I had departed from the truth."

Qualms over self-exposure is particularly true of the essentially autobiographical writer, the creative writer who mainly draws his material from his own life experience. His fear is that in the revelation of Self, even if he artfully uses the third person device of telling, he will yet stand naked for all the world to see. With all veils dropped, his secrets will be forever out, commonly-known and common talk. The 50c paperback of his sins and sinfulness will be in the hands of his friend, foe, wife, and teenage daughter. We can speculate on how many distinguished writings never reach the publisher for this understandable reason of inhibition. From my view of it, and based to an extent on findings, it is a quite stupendous total.

Novelists well know that books have been withdrawn on the mere threat of prosecution — as with Sudermann's "Das Hohe Lied," and Theodore Dreiser's "The Genius." That, in the case of Dreiser's "The Titan," the New York publisher of this novel suppressed the first edition on his own initiative, before publication. That in connection with "The Rainbow" prosecution, D. H. Lawrence charged that his publisher "almost wept before the Magistrate," swearing that "he did not know the dirty thing he had been handling, he had not read the work, his reader had misadvised him."

The writer can, of course, exercise total literary prerogative by bypassing the timid publisher. He can arrange for the printing of his brainchild privately, at his own expense. Which raises the awful question of money, that obscenity of all obscenities.

and Clothilde—and they, stupid people, never caught her unFrench accent whenever she was obliged to exchange a few words with them.

Once she had an Italian major and his aide as guests. He noticed her accent but he didn't give her away as an American which goes to show the difference between Italians and Germans in more ways than one.

She told us rich stories about the Maquis, whom she adores, and about the Mayor-Monsieur le Maire Justin Hey, thin, brighteyed, with grey white, stained moustachios—the real hero of the piece. The Mayor simply never put her down on his records at all.

And there was the Station Master. He had to work with two German assistants to run the railroad centre—Culoz is a railway crossroads and 80% of the people in the village work for the railway—and the Station Master was in the Maquis all the time and the Huns never knew.

A No-Account Count

There was only one collaborationist of note in Culoz, an old Count who lives like a feudal lord, and is certain that France ought to have a King just as he was certain that the Americans would never come and that the Germans would win the war.

His, today, is the only house in Culoz where there are no flags, and in the house there is great tragedy because the Count's beautiful daughter has married a thin, nervous, but brave young man of middleclass parents who has been a Maquis and I saw him today and he had just come from liberating a nearby village. He sees the beautiful daughter of the Count, in short, his wife, only once a week and she has turned from him and is more Vichyite than ever and of such stuff was our conversation made for hours while, when the sun burst out unexpectedly over the broad front lawn of La Colombiere, the village children came to play Maquis and make sounds like machineguns and I thought of Tommy and his Jars.

We went to the Stein house on Friday. This is Sunday. And I'm on tenterhooks. You see Gertrude had written a book. I took one look at the mss. and asked her if I couldn't have it for Collier's and she said yes. She said Bennett Cerf was her publisher and she forthwith named him her agent. I wired Collier's at once asking them if they thought that $20,000 would be too much to pay for the magazine rights to her book, which is an autobiographical account of her four years under the Nazis and will be, I think, the first story by a major author on Occupied France. I haven't yet had a reply. Tomorrow I go to fetch the rest of the book which Alice is typing and to have dinner, alone, with G. and A. I'll write to you about it from, I suppose, Rome. I expect to leave for Rome Tuesday morning early.

Well, it doesn't matter too much whether Collier's takes it or not although I'd be disappointed if they didn't. At any rate I'll take the mss. to Rome with me and have it censored (good God!) and send it on to Bennett or to Collier's depending on circumstances. In any case will you tell Bennett the gist of all this—he might read the whole letter if you like—and that he may expect a new Stein work in due course.

Today we drove out to her place, lunched with her and Alice, and took her out here to meet the boys and make a recording for CBS and have dinner at our awful camp mess. She seemed to like the C-rations and her dog. I almost forgot Basket the Second, a French poodle who has 20 generations of German blood in his veins but they keep it from him so as not to break his spirit. She was happy to meet all the boys. They didn't quite know who she was, most of them, but they all sent peices to the papers. A rose is a rose is a rose was about the only quote that got out.

Vigilante Justice

And now I am getting very tired typing as I had little sleep last night—little sleep and an execution. I saw citizens shoot six wretched fellows who'd joined the Naziphile French Militia and borne arms against the State and were therefore traitors and executed before a huge mob in the rain by a platoon of rifles. That was in Grenoble, yesterday. I couldn't sleep for that, and for the cold which was atrocious. I had just had your letter about the heat in New York and I spent the night shivering in my cold, raindrenched tent and the letter was dated two weeks before.

As we left Gertrude's house the first night, Friday, Bill took one look at the strange woman and said, "Who's that hatchet?" When he saw huge, white, wooly, goofy looking Basket the Second today, when we finished lunch and mounted Hepzibah for the return to camp, Bill spluttred "And where did she get that mutton?" Bill still doesn't know who Gertrude Stein is and I've given up because when I said she was a writer he said, "Yeah? And for what paper?" Gertrude remembers "Palms" and Alice said she knew the name of Kathryn McGuigan and I didn't inquire into the details. Both recalled Idella Purnell. Stein, it seems, contributed to Palms.

I'm enclosing a small souvenir, the proof of an article GS wrote for a provincial paper which. I hope you will have suitably framed for my study. I've never collected such stuff but this one has special meaning for me, somehow, and if some damn censor doesn't pinch it, I hope you'll take good care of it.

I'm off now to get some sleep and to dream of you and of coming home to you and the boys. Give everyone my best—to Vincent and Helen, Alice and Newell, the Perrys and any others I may have forgotten. I miss Bronxville very much—and you fill me with homesickness when you talk of grilled steaks in the garden. I'm very glad about Ruthie. I hope she has more stickum to it than she once did. Above all I hope she overcomes that apple-round semi-impertinence that develops from her inferiority complex and best way she can get rid of the latter is to realize that you don't need to go to a University to obtain an education, and that it's good to talk and hear one's lovely phrases but better to write them and throw them away and write them again and so on ad infinitum than it is merely to mouth them if one wants to be a writer. But I don't see why anyone should.

P.S.—You never told me how that Wendell Wilkie dinner party went.

I'm so glad you liked my Rome Revisited and hope you'll like Invasion, which I don't now although I did when I wrote it. I haven't written anything worth a damn, not anything. I did like the bit about Rachele Mussolini, but that's about all. Don't know what the hell's the matter with me, don't know. Tired, maybe. Oh yes, Carl Mydans, of Life, went out with us today and took scads of photographs and I'm in some of them with Stein & Co. Look for them, you'll be amused.

Opera's Golden Age

is not an ideal Raoul, neither in distinction and elegance of style nor in the robustness and sustained singing of the part." Caruso could have his off-nights, too!

Farther back in operatic history we find goddess of song Nellie Melba "cold as a block of ice" and "leaving much to be desired in respect to warmth and sentiment . . . making little attempt to give dramatic significance to her action." Emma Calve is chastised for "willful maltreatment of the music" of her greatest vehicle, Carmen, when she began to overemphasize her prima donna temperament to the detriment of artistic values.

I could fill a dozen notebooks with excerpts like these, clearly illustrating that singers of the several Golden Ages of the Metropolitan contributed their share of lead and brass mixed with the precious metal in about the same ratio known today.

Golden To Whom?

It all comes down to a definition of terms. A Golden Age is the time back just a few years, the period before ours, the glorious heyday of our youth or our parents' youth or somebody's youth. People ignore the fact that every period has its great performances and its second-rate ones, its historic interpretations and pedestrian miscalculations, its high praise and its damning criticism.

Part of the modern reverence for early singers stems from the group of audiophiles who have made a cult of old recordings. However, disks of hoary vintage tell fewer lies than is commonly believed. Though obscured by terrible scratchiness and the ultimate "low-fi" of pre-electrical recording technique, some of the great voices often can't help but sound off-pitch, hooty, unfocused, forced and musically unreliable. As variable in their art as any singer of today, these stars immortalized not only their finer moments but also enough scoops, gulps, sobs, distortions, interpolations and unbelievable tempi to make any modern opera enthusiast shudder.

Judging by the evidence already in, it is my firm belief that our own age will inevitably attain the golden label that only time can bestow. And when those singers who are now engaged in assuring their immortality have all retired from "active duty," they will have achieved a record unique in the annals of operatic history. For at no other period has so much been accomplished against such overwhelming odds.

Ensemble Dictates

Most of today's operatic artists have, of necessity, been forced to abdicate the position of supreme power once assumed by heroes and heroines of the Met's Grau, Conried and Gatti eras. The need for perfect ensemble, which never worried earlier generations, has been forced upon our singers by general managers, conductors and, perhaps most significantly, an informed and hyper-critical public. It was far easier to develop an astounding career in the 1890s, when a singer could ignore rehearsals, flout even the most rudimentary staging directions and pursue applause to the mortal injury of an entire production.

An English music critic, writing of the vocal giants of former eras, has pointed out that "these great spectacular egomaniacs did not devote themselves to opera but devoted opera to themselves." Questioned why she demanded an astonomical fee for a single festival appearance, the "divine" Adelina Patti is documented as replying: "I am a musical festival." Caruso's rejoinder to Toscanini that "people pay to hear me sing, not to look at your back" is a familiar opera house anecdote.

The De Reszkes, Nordicas, Melbas and Carusos never faced today's economic struggles in their slow and careful climb to greatness. No income taxes reduced their large earnings to meager totals, making necessary a continual breakneck singing schedule. Nor did any of them ever have to speed by jet flight from one city to another in order to fulfill opera and concert commitments. I envy them their plushy private parlor cars, their leisurely tours and lengthy rest periods abroad.

Today's opera singer, unlike any functioning in earlier days, has to withstand the siren song and tempting dazzle of Broadway and television. He must build a repertoire while performing it and snatch opportunities as they appear. Having reached some measure of fame and artistic success, he must compete creditably with movie stars, theatre figures and cafe society in the ruthless spotlight of modern publicity. But, despite all these problems, the world of opera and its singers is now in a far healthier artistic condition than ever before.

Van Johnson to Rejoin London 'Music Man'

London.

Van Johnson, recuperating nicely after severing the tip of one finger during a performance 10 days ago of "The Music Man," is expected to resume his starring role Monday (8).

Gordon Boyd had been understudying him at the Adelphi here.

Jurgens in Mex for 'Garden'

Mexico City.

Curt Jurgens arrived here weeks in advance of the scheduled shooting of "The Secret Garden," under the direction of Richard Rush. Latter is also expected here to start casting the Mexican supporting and bit players for film which will go before cameras sometime in January.

Jurgens, meanwhile, said he was getting used to the Mexican weather, this taking form of sunning himself on Acapulco beaches.

Fence Divides So. African Drive-In But New Theatres Despite Apartheid

By ARNOLD HANSON

Capetown.

The South African economy is somewhat uncertain, partly due to the political overtones. The elections of October were preceded by tightness of money. But the immediate nervousness is counterbalanced by a confidence in the nation, though under United Nations' "disapproval" for its racial segregation.

Empire Films, under William Boxer, is continuing its expansion, building new houses. After completing the 596-seater, Pigalle, in Johannesburg last year, firm opened Cape Town's newest theatre, the Monte Carlo on Sept. 21. Another house, also called Monte Carlo is almost completed in Bulawayo, Northern Rhodesia.

Local Monte Carlo, is housed in a new building of the same name and situated on the rapidly developing foreshore, reclaimed land near the docks. Equipped with two 70m Cinemeccanica machines imported from Milan, Italy, the first curved festoon curtain in South Africa. Capacity is 601.

Empire Films will concentrate on British and Continental product which have a great pull for audiences here.

Biocafes

Biocafes are very popular in Cape Town due to the low charges and all-day grind. Morris Miller, who owns several, is building another one, called the Parkway in the Parkade area.

Drive-ins have been doing fair biz. They are popular with families on holiday at the seaside.

Religious Prejudice

Board of Censors banned the Clarence Darrow-Williams Jennings Bryan pic "Inherit the Wind" (UA) considering it liable to give offense to fundamentalist religious feelings. Board consented to Elvis Presley's "The Flaming Star" (20th-Fox) being shown to whites only. The naural birth film, "The Case of Dr. Laurent," also released by 20th-Fox, was passed "for women only" over the age of 18 years.

Few releases lately have done good biz but "Suzie Wong" caught on and attracted fairly good houses. "The Alamo" was a flop principally due to increased admission charges.

The forcing of "apartheid" on the non-whites in the Republic is causing growing ill-feeling and encouraging them to protest in every way. The legit production, "Dear Liar," with the American author and actor Jerome Kilty, was staged for one night for non-whites but as only 20 attended, the evening was cancelled just before curtain rise. The boycott was arranged as a protest against separate audiences.

A Cape Town drive-in has erected a fence down the centre of the area so that they can have a mixed patronage. Unless special arrangements are made visiting artists and companies perform to whites only as the main theatres are licensed accordingly.

The color bar has been lifted in South Rhodesia after a very trying period and mixed audiences are permitted. At first the non-whites were shy and slow in joining the whites but they are getting used to attending the big houses in spite of mixed feelings and demonstrations from both sides. Although the prices of admission are above the means of most non-whites, the managers hope they will fill the gaps caused by the falling-off audiences due to television.

Maleno Malenotti has just wound "Madame Sans-Gene" with Sophia Loren, as well as "Italian Women and Love," and is readying "La Rossa," directed by Helmut Kautner, for a mid-January start in Venice, with an important international cast. This one is in co-production with Hamburg's Real Film. Ottavio Poggi's Max Films has wound "Nefertiti, Queen of the Nile," with Jeanne Crain and "Gordon, the Black Pirate," with Ricardo Montalban and Vincent Price, and is planning other items employing Yank thesps, for 1962.

Royal Films, after winding their current Mel Ferrer starrer, "The Black Lancers," will concentrate on the aforementioned "Imperial Venus," with Gina Lollobrigida. Sancro Films, a new company which made its local debut with "The Gold of Rome," plans to follow up with pic to be shot in part in the US, Marco Ferreri's "Trip to America," written by Rafael Azcona. SPA Productions, spurred by success of its recent "Hercules" pix, will follow up with some prestige items such as Luigi Zampa's "Roaring Years," and Folco Quilici's "I Mille Fucochi," as well as "Le Nuove Orientali," a feature documentary.

Titanus, whose big one for 1962 is "The Last Days of Sodom and Gomorrah," directed by Robert Aldrich, and whose currently shooting roster includes: "Il Disordine," with Susan Strasberg; "The Golden Arrow," with Tab Hunter and Rossana Podesta; "I Giorni Contati;" "Tico and his Shark," by Folco Quilici; "Arturo's Island," plans a 7 billion lire budget for forthcoming product. This will include, so far, 11 features. These are "The Leopard," to be directed in Sicily in April by Luchino Visconti; "Son of Spartacus," with Steve Reeves, and Gordon Scott; "Cronaca Famigliare," Valerio Zurlini directing Marcello Mastroianni; "Sergente nella Neve," director Ermanno Olmi, to be shot in Russia; Nanny Loy's "Four Days of Naples;" and films by Michaelangela Antonioni this first color film), Alfredo Giannetti, Antonio Pietrangeli, Elio Petri, Mario Soldati, Franco Rossi.

Vides Films, Franco Cristaldi's company, will follow up 1961's "L'Assassino," "Ghosts in Rome," "One Day a Lion," and its upcoming releases such as "Salvatore Giuliano," "Day by Day, Desperately," and "Divorce, Italian Style," with "The Titans," a UA release currently winding in Spain. 1962 roster will be announced soon. Zebra Films, currently involved in a long censorship battle over its Venice Fest contender, "Thou Shalt Not Kill," which has been banned in Italy, is winding "La Steppa," directed by Alberto Lattuada, on Yugoslav locations.

Recorded Junk Music

some cities were able to completely dominate the area, attracting audiences even greater than top-rated network stars like Arthur Godfrey, Jack Benny and Bob Hope. With very few exceptions the radio deejay selected the music to be played and created the style of his own show, often filling four to five hours of airtime a day. The individual d.j. jockey and the music he played were what the mass public listened for and to.

In the mid-1950s with the growth of independent stations to an important position in the industry, a new force entered the picture. Chain operations came to the big cities with task forces of glib, fast-talking, low-paid announcers, hopped-up musical station identification and public service jingles, slickly designed contests and well-tested attention-getting gimmicks and a rigid all-inclusive musical formula.

Within a short time the "new sound," aided by sharp exploitative and aggressive techniques, skyrocketed to an important position in the industry. "Top 40" and a new "swinging station" formula were shortly imitated and emulated by a large and ever increasing number of stations. With the rise of formula radio the position of high-paid personality disk jockeys became untenable, and almost all of these performers have now virtually disappeared from the radio scene. In their place, almost totally devoid of individual personalities, many even with manufactured names owned by the stations where they are employed, developed a group of young announcers trained to rapidly and enthusiastically repeat a highly limited and inane group of stock phrases dealing with time, weather, station identification and music lists.

Downgrading Quality

Even before the drive to power of formula radio stations personality disk jockeys on top independent stations had already begun to downgrade the quality of music and types of services that were previously the standards of performance. This reflected the new social and economic facto: that in the mid-1950s began to affect American culture.

There is absolutely no question that the responsibility for introducing much of what is called "junk music" to general radio audiences lies not with the "top 40" formula station, but is almost entirely due to personality disk jockeys at the peak of their power.

Subject to shifting pressures of record distributors and manufacturers, performers, teenage audiences, and ultimately radio station policies, personality disk jockeys initiated the playing and concentrated exploitation of single, currently popular phonograph records of a type that had never been generally mass circulated in previous music business history. While popular music up to the early 1950s largely reflected standard American popular music tradition, the middle '50s saw a definite trend toward production of rhythm & blues and country & western music.

The development of longplaying records and 45 rpm single records had resulted in hundreds of new firms entering the record business. Many of the new companies focused on this low cost, previously ignored type of music and radio stations relied heavily on record company products to fill great chunks of airtime.

Abdication of Radio

The net result of free records and promotional and exploitation tactics was the practical abdication of radio stations of their programming function, not only to disk jockeys but to producers of popular single records. The result of such abdication and the tremendous demand for exposure and airtime by record producers was the driving from the air of most music that was in any way reflective of the main traditions of American popular music, give or take its often unrealizable idealism, sometimes saccharine melodies and frequent lyrical inanities. A sort of Gresham's Law of music mediocre music driving quality music off the air, has been in operation for the past few years.

A listener to contemporary formula radio would have little or no awareness of the great strain of American popular music represented by Romberg, Herbert, Rodgers & Hart, the Gershwins, Berlin, Kern, Cole Porter, Ellington, or great contemporary writers. He would also not be exposed to jazz, authentic folk music, musical comedy and show tunes or, at best, the only reflection he would have of this great musical heritage is modern popular arrangements by contemporary performers.

When a contemporary music business produces an amateur, talent-less collection of one-shot artists in a period of a few months and a large number of mass audience radio stations slavishly program 90% of their total musical content from such a selection, then a tragic situation exists in American society.

Why Continue?

Why do many stations continue to program a talk-and-music formula that to them represents the lowest common denominator? The answers you will get from management and performers is "we give the public what it wants," "we play what they're buying," and "if we don't play it, somebody else will." These managers are convinced that the "hot 100" songs, the "top 40," "the fabulous 50," and the "sensational 60," primarily by teenage artists, are essential to the maintenance and growth of major audiences in modern radio.

Who buys what in the highly diversified record market is a very difficult question to answer. While much research has been done there is no real concensus of opinion. The most acceptable statements are that subteens and teenagers buy most of the single popular records and that later teenagers and adults buy most of the albums. There is obviously an extensive overlap from both directions.

Even if we accept the record-buying public as a true sample of the mass audience, we are faced with an unusual situation. The majority of records sold in record stores and through record clubs is overwhelmingly album music, and only a small percentage of this is even remotely similar to the music that dominates the popular charts and formula radio station programming.

Sales Decline

During the past few years, with formula radio at its peak, sales of single records, with obvious exceptions like Elvis Presley and Ricky Nelson, have decreased to a point where an alarmed industry is frantically seeking a remedy. At this writing the industry seems to be concentrating on the introduction of new, lowpriced record players and extensive promotion of compact single records with multiple selections, actually a smaller, lowerpriced LP. This new product, in combination with price cuts, is designed to extend the single record market into the homes that have LP record players.

If formula radio stations are playing "what the public wants" as determined by the sales of phonograph records, why are they not programming in a way that reflects the actual economics of the record business? If sales are the determining factor, then formula radio stations should be playing three to four album selections for each single popular record. This is obviously not the case. The performance of albums and better quality popular music is largely the function of "good music," "adult," or "quality group" radio stations, and the growing group of FM stations whose programming reflects great diversity and intelligence.

It is quite clear that formula radio stations programming from a rigid list of single popular records and a few top selling albums are not at all programming what the majority of the public is buying. They are actually programming what a small minority is purchasing and in this sense they have abdicated their programming function not only to the record companies, who after all do produce a tremendous amount of excellent music, but even more completely to the subteen, the teenager and the immature adult in American society.

This group, with quite uniform tastes and interests, today occupies a prominent position in the thinking of radio management simply because they know what they want and tune it in regularly and with slavish conformity. The audience that has the teenager is, as a result, often No. 1 in the ratings.

This is largely true because the adult audience no longer seems to identify as it formerly did with specific radio shows. For all practical purposes, radio as an adult activity is largely a background entertainment interspersed at times with service announcements that simplify adult living.

Within a period of a half hour on a formula radio station a listener gets the time, several times, news in capsule form, weather reports and predictions, sports and other capsule information that keeps him fairly up-to-date. Many adults listen to contemporary radio, then, for immediate service benefits. It is obvious, however, that many adults, resentful of formula radio's concentration on teenage music, have been permanently alienated from listening to the radio at all.

Alienation Of Adults

The alienation of adults from current popular music seems to reflect more than just a normal antipathy to the teenage image. It is quite significantly involved with the prevalence of hit records that are identified by the adult with white southerners or Negro performers. This kind of musical chauvinism, in combination with a general feeling of being excluded by a special group (the teenagers), is capable of building up tremendous aggression in the adult.

The success of white southern and Negro performers in popular music fields in recent years has led to the belief in some quarters that this democratization of popular music reflects in a lessening of prejudice and potential discrimination.

This belief is widely held in the south as far as Negro performers are concerned. The activities of White Citizens Councils in attacking "mongrel" music and other similar actions sharply reflects this feeling.

While there is little research in this specific area I am reasonably sure from my own analyses that there is little or no effect on the individual exposed to popular music except to reinforce his already fixed opinions and feelings. The forces acting on Americans in racial problems areas are highly complex and are not easily isolated and analyzed. However, the intellectual and emotional responses involved in a strong identification with jazz music and its roots in American Negro culture are very significant in a positive approach to intergroup and human relations.

Reverse 'Jim Crow'?

It ought to be at least briefly mentioned, however, that the majority of urban white people do not seem to actively discriminate in their purchase of LP records by Negro performers. There is, oddly enough, great discrimination expressed in buying patterns by the Negro community. It is quite evident that Negroes, with few exceptions, are not purchasers of records by white artists. While there is some such buying on the part of Negro college students and, to a limited degree, Negro highschool students, the majority of the Negro community rejects totally any contact with the white musical scene.

This prejudice has in the past often extended itself to repudiation and rejection of Negro artists who have become widely accepted by white audiences. Another kind of discrimination, sometimes called "Crow Jim" (antipathy to white performers), has been quite significant in the jazz field. While it is easy to understand this rejection on psychological and sociological analysis, it is a tragic and disturbing situation.

It is obvious that formula radio is not the final answer to the American communications problem. Success in itself is not enough. There is a distinct need for broader programming that will fulfill the real needs of larger areas of the community. This kind of programming, combined with a spirit of real public service, intelligent showmanship, and professional expertise, is easily possible even in the brillantly competitive markets that exist today.

There are indications that this type of radio programming is already gaining impetus. It is too much to expect that a commercial medium like radio will ever be a totally dedicated and socially perceptive institution. But under the stimulus of aggressive and aroused public opinion and dynamic industry leadership a new and important era is beginning, an era that will develop and instruct as well as entertain, that will encourage and stimulate as well as relax.

Formula For Paris Idyll

day. I've got to get off this treadmill before it kills me. How much money do I need to live in Europe? Please send me all details: rents, food, entertainment, etc."

We tossed a sample letter on the table at the Deux Magots and asked for answers.

"How much money will he need?"

"Golly, if he's got much money, he can't do it at all," replied Mike in his slow, soft drawl.

"I saw a fellow this morning, gets $100 a week steady. Imagine, $100 a week every week! But, he's always broke and borrowing. You see, because he's got all that money, he can't get over the habit of spending.

"Let's face it, Americans today are 'money-holics.' It's a big problem. They don't know how to go on the wagon, and it's awful hard for them to learn how to lay off the green stuff."

Mike owns a house in California. He gets $100 per month rent from it. As far as income goes, that's it.

He and Mrs. Mike live in a farm town in the centre of France. The garlic belt. Mike sculpts, and she tends house and garden.

He's in Paris three or four times a year, exhibiting at the Biennale, the Salon d'Automne or the Jeunes Sculpteurs. And you may bump into them strolling down the Ramblas in Barcelona, in the hills back of Florence, or by the canals in Amsterdam.

You might say they've found it.

"Please send all details."

"It seems to me that when they ask for all the answers, they're on the wrong track," said Gabe.

"This thing has got to be a discovery, and you can't discover what's for you by working with another fellow's answers. They'll only get you into trouble.

"This thing is dropping an old life in order to create a new one. But your friend's letter sounds as though he's looking for a rest home, not for the adventure of walking in a new, unknown direction."

Gabe was shot up during the war and gets a small pension from the Army. He figured he had done his life's duty for his country so stayed overseas.

A doctor told him he might live if he exercised. So now he's a ski champ and mountain-climbing expert. Does the reading and writing he loves, and bicycles all over the Continent.

Somehow he's gathered two apartments in Paris, winter headquarters in Megeve and Innsbruck, and a summer cottage on a Mediterranean island. He's always offering them free to pals and strangers to live in.

Gabe's also gathered a French wife and a baby son.

You might say he's made it.

Doc had been scanning the letter.

"Sounds like he's still looking for security, which means nose to the grindstone wherever you are," said Doc. "When the slavery hurts bad enough, you give up on security and settle for freedom today with no guarantees for tomorrow.

"Freedom is head in the air, love your neighbor, shoot for the stars, and stop aiming for the gutter. It feels just fine. After the first few uncertain 'feeling - your - way' months, you learn that freedom's the only security."

Doc was a schoolteacher in the days before teachers thought that they should get decent pay, too. When he and his lady broke down from the treadmill pace, they sold their farm in upper New York State, invested the receipts in Savings & Loan, and came to Europe to live or die on the miniature income.

Now Doc's got all day to paint. They rent a gracious old farmhouse on Majorca. On a peak overlooking the blue sea and flaming sunsets. It's a pleasant, half-hour stroll to the big city of Palma.

Beautiful servants, gourmet banquets, flowered terraces and shady fruit orchards, a house full of art and literature, and the best hi-fi set and record collection in Spain.

Recently they started getting Social Security checks. They don't know what to do with the extra money. So far, it just piles up in savings banks.

Gabe interrupted the gab at our sidewalk-cafe table to suggest steak au poivre and a bottle of Tavel at Poussineau's. We paid our checks (one apertif each and three hours of lounging: 30¢), and they began moving toward the Rue Bonaparte.

"And what about this letter?" I asked.

"Better just forget it," said Mike. "It's too bad, but when they've got to ask questions, they don't really want to quit. They've just had a hard day at the office and want to dream awhile. Probably by now your friend's forgotten all about the dream."

"And if he hasn't?"

"If he really hasn't, he doesn't need any answers. He'll be here by spring, and nothing in this world can stop him."

poured out into the street. It was as if Alicia's triumph, in some way had been mine. "Alicia won again," I shouted. "She's the most beautiful girl in the world."

I am not making the point that it was NTG who killed vaudeville. No more than I consider Clara Bow's underwear to be responsible for any decline of Hollywood. It is merely my opinion that our literary and theatrical arts have, for too long, been getting away with shirking its responsibility to teach life, and therefore, beauty, to our people, especially the young ones. If one will not quite go along with Jimmy Walker, who had never met a woman that had been corrupted by a book, there should at least be room for culture that can teach a man to say "I love you" to a woman without shuffling his toes, or fiddling with his hands, or other such apple-pie gestures of clean-cuttedness, whatever that is.

There is not a good movie (repeat—good movie) around to which I wouldn't take my eight-year-old daughter (who has already asked, and been told, how babies are made). (Can Tuesday Weld say the same?)

Books will survive Public Guardians. They always have. Movies will, too. If French children can survive French pictures and Italian children the Italian, is there not hope for us?

One sign exhibited itself on a summer afternoon in South River, N.J. To lift the hex inflicted on them by a new Korvette discount house, the local merchants hired an actor to spend a few hours impersonating Davy Crockett—raccoon hat, rifle and all. But Crockett flopped it. All the kids were at the neighborhood theatre where the marquee boasted, in two memorable lines:

that it will or will not do—in whole or in part—depending on the extent to which you get behind it and do something about it.

What to do? First, find out what the program is (you can get the report from Washington for free); then get your industry or craft behind it; then communicate—just plain communicate—to the Copyright Office and to your Senators and Congressmen in Washington. It is just amazing how the people in the communications field on the whole totally fail to communicate their needs and desires to Government agencies and authorities, with the result that they are—legally speaking—in many ways stepchildren in our body politic. This is a particularly bad and unnecessary situation in an administration—headed by one of their own—an author of a bestse'ler—and staffed in large part by others experienced and steeped in the entertainment and literary orbits.

Louis XIV—and Mayor Hague—said, with accuracy, "I am the law." I say that insofar as the law applicable to entertainers and entertainment is concerned, if you don't like the laws that apply to you, don't just sit there—change them.

1872) was a scholarly "Hamlet," but not a popular one. Some considered Henry Irving (1838-1905) the worst.

It is surprising that with all those years of productions that the first full text "Hamlet" was not presented in New York until 1938 with Maurice Evans in the title role. However, Ben Greet had been using the complete version in repertory on the road.

More Long-Runners

On the subject of longruns:

Burton Holmes, born Elias Burton Holmes, is among the marathon public performers. Claimed to have been appearing publicly since 1891, Town Topics of Nov. 23, 1893, records his professional debut in '93, but this may have reference to his New York bow. His biography in Who's Who in Music and Drama (1914) actually antedates both, pegging 1890 in Chicago as the year and place of his first lecture. He made his last professional appearance in person in 1951, a "run" of 61 years. He died at 88 in 1958. He was the first to use the motion picture to make "travel films" in 1897. Exhibition of Burton Holmes Travelogues, always a box-office attraction, has continued after his death and 1962 marks the 70th year.

A. E. Matthews, a prominent English actor who enjoyed great popularity in America was born Nov. 22, 1869 and died in England on July 25, 1960, made his debut as a callboy in 1886 and his last appearance in "How Say You?" at the Strand, London in 1959. Accordingly, he would have spent 73 years as an actor.

Mrs. G. H. Gilbert, nee Anne Hartley (1821-1904), debuted as a dancer in England at the age of 15, then beeame an actress and emigrated with her husband to the U.S. in 1849. She continued her career here until her death in Chicago, Dec. 2, 1904 while on tour with "Granny." That would give Mrs. Gilbert 68 years of acting.

Mrs. Thomas Whiffen, nee Blanche Galton (1845-1936), made her debut in London in 1865 and came to the U.S. in 1868 with the Galton Opera Co. She became a very popular and much beloved actress here and made her last appearance on the stage in "Trelawney of the Wells" in 1930—in all 65 years on the stage for Mrs. Whiffen.

George Gaston who was born Jan. 27, 1844 and died at the Actors' Home in Englewood, N. J., on Jan. 14, 1937 had retired in 1922 after appearing in "Listening In" at the Bijou. His obituary stated he was the oldest American actor, but am unable to verify that he was continuously engaged in the theatre.

Charles F. Lorraine, who died in Hamilton, Bermuda, Dec. 14, 1940 at the age of 91, had been on stage since he was 5. However, he had lived in Bermuda for 40 years and was not active as an actor during all this period.

Ludwig Solski, Polish actor was rated as the world's oldest performer, when he died in Cracow Dec. 19, 1954, at the age of 100 years, but no records of his career are available.

Joseph Jefferson III (1829-1905) played "Rip Van Winkle" for 45 years.

Guy Bates Post, now 86, made his professional debut in "Charlotte Corday" in 1893 and up until several years ago was out on the road appearing in "The Climax." His years in the theatre would add up to 68.

Ringling Bros. formed their circus in 1882 and it is still running.

In the circus field also there is Harry Nelson, a veteran clown and son of Sam Nelson, who made his first appearance with his father's circus at the age of 4. Harry was born July 16, 1884 and is at present traveling with the Ringling show, an outfit that he has been with since 1928. That would add up to 73 years in show business for Harry Nelson.

Albert G. Andrews, who died in 1950, at 93, had been on the stage more than 80 years, having debuted in England with "Masks and Faces" (titled "Peg Woffington" in the U.S.A.) in 1862 and closed his career with "The Cherry Orchard" in 1944 at the National Theatre, N. Y.

Kate Mayhew, with 78 years of acting to her credit, was born in Indianapolis in 1853 and at the age of five made her first appearance there in "Pizarro." Her final curtain call was taken in "Alice Takat" in 1936 and she died in New York on June 16, 1944.

Harry G. Davenport, vet screen player, first appeared on the stage in 1871 at the age of five, in Philadelphia, in "Damon's Boy." After a career on Broadway that ended with "Battleship Gertie" in 1935, he went on in films, having entered them in 1912, until his death in Hollywood Aug. 9, 1949. So, 78 years for Mr. Davenport.

Joseph Cawthorn, actor and dialect comedian born in N. Y. March 29, 1867, appeared on the stage at the age of four with the Pickaninny Minstrels, graduating to Haverly's Minstrels in 1872. He was a musical comedy favorite from 1899-1925, when he then concentrated on films.

Ethel Griffies, although born in England in 1878, spent most of her time in the U.S. She made her first stage appearance in "East Lynne" (1881) in her native country and came to New York in 1924 to debut in "Havoc," making her final appearance in America with "The Royal Family" in 1951, a total of 70 years.

James Gleason, stage and film star, made his first appearance with his parents in 1890 at the age of five. His N. Y. debut was in "Pretty Mrs. Smith" (1914) and he had a successful Broadway career that continued into films until his death in 1959 at the age of 74, so it is 69 years of acting for him.

Charles Winninger, perennial comedian, was a boy soprano at the age of six and appeared as an acrobat with Winninger Bros. in vaudeville. He was born in Athens, Wis., Feb. 26, 1885 and although his last show on Broadway was "Music In the Air" in 1951, he has continued his picture career that commenced in 1915. So, allow Mr. Winninger, at least 69 years as a performer.

Dame May Whitty, distinguished English actress, debuted in Liverpool, Eng., in 1881 and ended her career in "Night Must Fall" at La Jolla, Calif., in 1947, giving her 66 years on the stage. She died in Hollywood May 29, 1948.

Charles D. Coburn, who died Aug. 30, 1961, was born in Macon, Ga., June 19, 1877. In 1891 he became a program boy at the Savannah Theatre, in Georgia, advancing to ticketseller, then treasurer and finally manager. He turned to acting and in 1903 made his N. Y. debut in "Up State New York." His career ended in Indianapolis, August 1961, in the farce, "You Can't Take It With You;" 70 years in the theatre with approximately 66 years as an actor.

Fred Stone, continued his career although handicapped by an injury received in an auto accident. He was born in Longmont, Col., Aug. 19, 1873 and first appeared as an actor in 1884 with a tabloid show. In 1894 he joined with Dave Montgomery, a partnership that was a happy one down through the years and only ended with Montgomery's death in 1917. Fred, the father of the talented Dorothy, Paula and Carol, finally said his farewell to the theatre after 66 years as an actor when he appeared, in 1950, at the Las Palmas Theatre, Hollywood, in "You Can't Take It With You." He died in North Hollywood, March 6, 1959.

Edmund Gwenn, fine character actor, who passed away in Hollywood, Sept. 6, 1959 spent 64 years in the theatre and films, having first appeared on the stage in England in 1895.

Victor Moore, comedian of stage and screen, has been going strong for 60 years plus. He was born in Hammonton, N. J., on Feb. 24, 1876 and the stage first saw him in a Boston production of "Babes In the Wood" in 1893. He appeared in "Carousel" at the N. Y. City Center Theatre, in 1957. That chalks up 64 years of acting for this sterling performer.

Ethel Barrymore, Grand Dame of the American Theatre, (she appeared so young and so active for so long that she would probably have resented that title) was born in Philadelphia, Aug. 15, 1879, and when she said her final farewell in Beverly Hills on June 18, 1959, she had been a performer for 63 years, from her debut at the Arch St. Theatre, Philadelphia, in "The Rivals" on Jan. 25, 1894, until her final appearance on the screen in "Johnny Trouble" in 1957. Miss Barrymore was thought by many to be a newcomer to films when, in 1932, she appeared in "Rasputin and the Empress" with her brothers, Lionel and John. However, she had appeared in quite a few of the early silent films from 1915 to 1918.

Billie Burke made her first appearance in 1898 as a singer in Europe and her N. Y. debut in 1907 with "My Wife." She has been in films since 1916 and appeared in the road tryout of "Listen to the Mocking Bird" in 1959 and is still going strong with 62 years of acting to her credit.

Claude Rains, made his bow in 1900, in London, as a child with "Sweet Nell of Old Drury." He last appeared on Broadway in "Night of the Auk" (1956), but continues his fine acting career in films that commenced in 1933, so allow Mr. Rains 61 years.

Ed Wynn, comedian and composer, the "Perfect Fool" debuted in vaudeville in 1900. He was born in Philadelphia Nov. 9, 1886 and has successfully run the gamut of vaudeville, musical comedy, motion pictures and radio, to continue in television. That gives him 61 years as a laugh-getter.

May Robson, w.k. on the stage and screen, was born in Melbourne, Australia, April 19, 1864 and debuted in "The Hoop of Gold" in Brooklyn, 1884. Miss Robson trouped throughout the U.S. as well as starring on Broadway and her career of 58 years finally ended with her death in Beverly Hills, Oct. 20, 1942.

Bobby Clark, late funnyman, who teamed with Paul McCullough for 34 years, spent 56 of his 72 years on the stage. He first appeared in minstrels in 1902 and bid farewell to the stage in 1958 with "Damn Yankees" and died in N. Y. City, Feb. 12, 1960.

Leo Carrillo, who died at 81, Sept. 10, 1961, had played the Orpheum Circuit as early as 1904 and continued on to legitimate, films, radio and television. He retired in the middle 1950s because of illness, but continued his role of Grand Marshall in parades and at fairs, so list him among those 50 years in the business.

Edward Everett Horton, talented actor and pastmaster of the "double-take," is listed as born in Brooklyn on March 18, 1887. He made his professional bow in "The Man Who Stood Still" at the Circle Theatre, N. Y., in 1908. Having almost made a career of the play, "Springtime for Henry," he has been out on the road lately playing in "Nina;" credit Mr. Horton with 53 years.

Al Jolson, one of the all time greats, listed his year of birth as 1886, the insurance company said 1879, and it was compromised at 1884. Regardless, he made his first professional appearance (in a mob scene) with "Children of the Ghetto" at the Herald Square Theatre, N. Y., October 1899, thus at the time of his death in San Francisco on Oct. 23, 1950 he had been 51 years a performer.

In the idiom of Jolson, Clark and Carillo, among the variety vets with more than a half-century of public performance behind them must be included the late great Fred Allen, McIntyre & Heath, along with Sophie Tucker, Eddie Cantor, Jack Benny, George Burns, Blossom Seeley, George Jessel, Bert Lahr, Smith & Dale, and probaby others.

Origin of 'Tank Town'

In Harry Birdoff's book, "The World's Greatest Hit—Uncle Tom's Cabin'" (S. F. Vanni, 1947), the entymology of the term "tank-town" usually stemmed from "Tom" shows. Playing one-nighters in tank towns, as did most "Uncle Tom's Cabin" troupes, the most familiar landmark at the sundry whistle-stop stations was the water tank, right at the railroad station.

The expression originated in the early '80s when these troupes were "Tomming The Tanks." According to Birdoff there were more than 150 companies presenting one or another version of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" in towns and hamlets such as Ashtabula and Steubenville, O., Beaver Falls, Pa., Bogalusa, La., Chicopee, Mass., Keokuk, Ill., Muskogee, Okla., North Tonawanda, N.Y. Most of these towns have since become larger cities with important local industry but, in their era, some 80 years ago, they were lesser stopoffs.

Theatre historian Samuel Stark observes that before the use of water scoops and diesel engines, the railway timetables carried a symbol indicating a "water stop."

Incidentally, it would take a crystalball and a battery of IBM machines to really dope out the win-place-show between "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "East Lynne," "The Two Orphans," "The Old Homestead" and "Rip Van Winkle."

Competition and 'Runaway'

cost of making pictures is so fantastic that you don't have more than a 1,000 to one chance to get your money back."

On the other hand, there are those who say that labor wage savings possible abroad on a comparative basis are frequently negated by the greater length of time it often takes to make pictures.

Most often voiced complaints of producers appears to be not so much the high Hollywood wage scales, but rather the size of the crews union requirements demand and that, generally speaking, crews don't put out as much as they could to get a job done in the fastest possible time.

"Why work yourself out of a job sooner than necessary?" one worker acknowledged.

Call 'Featherbedding' Villain In Hollywood's Production

However, and more to the point of truth, production crews as a rule gear themselves to the tempo of the director. This is true abroad as well as here. In other words, if the director is in full command and moves rapidly from one setup to the next the crew will be right on his heels.

George Stevens, speaking of the financing of his "The Greatest Story Ever Told," asserted it would cost $145,300 in California to costume 1,000 soldiers, whereas he could rent the costumes abroad for only $7,500. He declared the IATSE Costumers Union would not permit him to import costumes. The director-producer further explained that it would cost $115,000 to use 1,000 extras for a single day's shooting at Indio, Calif. (costs include transportation and food) whereas he could get extras in Spain for mob scenes at $5 per person a day.

"I say to people here in this industry," Stevens declared, "individuals, guilds, unions and artists, that they should consider the situation and try for a formula by which Americans can regain the initiative."

There's No Magical Economy In Making Pictures Overseas

The argument that foreign atmosphere can improve the quality of work performed does not always hold. Stevens knows this. So does Kirk Douglas, who at first thought about going abroad in producing "Spartacus," then was happy that he remained on the Universal backlot. Cecil B. DeMille made some background and other sequences for "The 10 Commandments" in Egypt, but filmed the bulk of the pic on Paramount stages. Leo McCarey was far from a happy man last summer in England directing 20th-Fox's William Holden starrer, "Satan Never Sleeps," a story about China!

Charles Schneer, currently one of Columbia's indies operating overseas (in Italy with "Jason and the Golden Fleece") maintains "movies are made abroad for primarily one reason: the subject matter and background require a certain locale—a certain combination of artistic and physical ingredients which cannot genuinely be duplicated in the environs of Southern California."

Billy Wilder, shooting "One, Two, Three" in Berlin and Munich last summer had to build a replica of the Brandenberg Gate when the East Berlin-Soviet guardians became uncooperative. And Arthur Freed had to round up a substitute swimming pool on an English country estate after weather drove him out of Italy in filming "Light in the Piazza" for Metro. In short, one doesn't always get the full measure of scenic blessings sought in shooting abroad.

Schneer, to prevent any misunderstanding, is not anti-Hollywood. He says "no one who has had world-wide production experience away from Hollywood would run away from Hollywood." He also opines that "as for economic advantage, it is erroneously reckoned that a picture which costs $3,000,000 to make in Hollywood costs considerably less to produce in Europe." He says "the differential in cost is a negligible factor" and that "the equalizing factor is the longer length of time it takes to make a film abroad."

Deadly to Morale, Diminished Employment Haunts Hollywood

People who take work out of the Hollywood studios by going abroad to make one or more features that could be made here and then blithely say Hollywood always will remain the center of U. S. film production are simply talking through their hats. Perhaps studio stages can stand idle, but can the technical manpower without which the creators could not function afford to await the prodigals' return?

Moreover, prolonged uncertainty about where tomorrow's work will come from, or if there will be any work, could create a serious phychological problem. As a matter of fact, there is a common complaint that enthusiasm, excitement and pulltogetherness have gone out of the motion picture business. Some blame this on the lack of continuity in production.

There are those who maintain that production has become a three-way contest among stars, directors and producers, with varying combinations of same grouping forces against studios (now regarded primarily as financing sources) to determine balance of authority in regard to production of a picture.

Whatever the underlying cause, or causes, the attitude is prevalent in top management circles that "it's impossible to satisfy talent."

It is not unusual to hear an exec say, "I don't know why I put up with all this aggravation. These blankety blank, etc., have no regard for anything except their own personal greed and vanity. . . Instead of demanding $300,000 and a percentage of the picture, that big stiff should be thankful he's not out pumping gas."

There is, unfortunately, very little respect between management and talent. There perhaps never really was much genuine respect. But before the vertical structure of the industry was toppled by the Dept. of Justice consent decree forcing the separation of exhibition, followed soon by the onslaught of television, talent was held in check by ironclad, exclusive service contracts. Hollywood was in fact a lush, lush "company town" and the inhabitants knew it.

Management criticizes talent for making unreasonable financial demands, but management isn't blameless for it encouraged soaring prices by meeting what it now calls fantastic demands.

Glasgow.

An ambitious "dream theatre," the Falcon, planned for the St. George's Cross area of the city, may have to shutter March 10 unless financial aid is forthcoming from the city corporation. A sum of $675,000 is needed pronto.

A public appeal for $750,000 has brought in only 10% of the target figure.

A YEAR OF NERVES, NUDES & NEGRO CLICKS

BB (Baseball, not Bardot), the Reds vs. the Yanks (World's Series, not the Kremlin), those self-conscious uptown (Harlem) Muslims, Dick Clark and The Fly (sequel to The Twist), "runaway" Hollywood film productions, copfighters, astronauts, Liz Taylor and "Cleopatra," Spyros Skouras' 20th-Fox troubles, death of Dag Hammarskjold, the 1962 Seattle Expo versus the upcoming 1964 N.Y. World's Fair, Rudy Vallee's comeback, Belle Barth not herself at Carnegie Hall, Lenny Bruce's personal "sick" language problems, "Never On Sunday," MCA, country & western records vs. rock 'n' roll, Jack Paar, the wow Joan Sutherland and Leontyne Price, "Lady Chatterley" in West End legit, Antony Armstrong-Jones' new billing as the Earl of Snowden, censorship pressures loli over the map "too adult" films, tv violence, Henry Miller's "Tropic of Cancer," cicl. cultural exchanges despite the sometimes not-too-cold war, nitery nudity, "uncommitted neutralist nations," NAACP pressures on Hollywood and tv for "broader" thespic assignments, upsurge of bellydancers, key clubs—all these, and more, were fodder for comedy and serious interpretation.

After Jack and Jackie clicked in Paris, the President cracked, "I'm the man who accompanied Jacqueline Kennedy to Paris."

Alex Andre used to be the name of a w.k. cocktail, but Jackie made her couturier's identity equally famous.

The beatniks were abating; the Greenwich Village coffeehouses were going in for more esoteric evolutions, such as ad lib performances, along with the poetry readings, which jammed-up the espresso impresarios on two counts: (1) with the gendarmerie on cabaret licensing and (2) with Equity over jurisdiction.

Lord Montague of Beaulieu Abbey was another to forever ban jazz festivals following the two-day shambles on his Hampshire estate near London.

Strips and Nudies

The stripperies made European dates for standard acts a hazard because the bra-less babes were hard to follow in any language. Down Under the Australian authorities frowned upon the Soho-transplanted strip shows from London, but the Seattle Exposition in '62 looks forward to the Crazy de Paris show, booked intact from the famed Paris musichall. Reno emulated Las Vegas with epidermis displays, with no official or customer protest but Mexico's National Assn. of Artists waits its femme members to cover up and its comics to tone down any double-entendre, especially with an eye to "protecting" the starlets.

West German censors banned an indie film, "Kiss Me As If There's No Tomorrow," claiming that the 42-inch bosom of starlet Regina Seiffer was not feminine pulchritude but deformed. German film producers, who had pioneered a call-girl cycle of films, including a notorious real-life prostie whose political and financial ties reached into high places, placed official taboo on any such further films. In France, five Paris femmes du pave sued the French National TV System that a documentary film, on prostitution as a social problem, had invaded their privacy with real-life telecamera pickups while plying their calling on the rues and boulevards.

Wave of cheaply-made, so-called "art" and nudist films, all Hollywood product, have been doing some business in the so-called exploitation and Skid Row houses. Essentially nudist and leeringly sexed themes, the "actors" have been chiefly recruited from "model schools" and has caused the Los Angeles police to probe the matter. All giving reputable picture biz a bad name.

As Las Vegas and Reno continued the strip policies, Hamburg's notorious waterfront entertainment sector, the Reeperbahn, decided on a cover-up policy but the German tourists and the sailors both no-like the "keep-it-on" edict.

By way of contrast: Brendan Behan's "The Hostage" was banned in Warsaw "because it could be offensive to Catholics," which is a curious reason in a Communist country.

Personal: The Dick Powells (June Allyson) reported reconciling after their 15-year marital split. The George Montgomerys (Dinah Shore) startled all their friends with announcement of their divorce following 18 years as "the happiest couple in Hollywood." Lucille Ball married nitery comic Gary Morton, after her divorce from Desi Arnaz. Lauren Bacall, Humphrey Bogart's widow, became Mrs. Jason Robards Jr., Marilyn Miller and Arthur Miller split. So did Rosemary Clooney and Jose Ferrer, not long after their fifth child was born. Rita Hayworth got her fifth divorce; teenage Pied Piper, Dick Clark his first. There were gags about Mort Sahl and George Jessel as "the fathers of the year."

More Personality Stuff

Marion Davies' $8,000,000 estate; she died at 64.

Bette Davis' $1,000,000 libel suit against Modern Screen, and Mr. and Mrs. Eddie Fisher (Elizabeth Taylor) ditto against a series of fan mags.

Hillbilly singer-songwriter, now Gov. Jimmie Davis, was spotlighted as giving some Louisiana state jobs to former members of his vocal group, The Plainsmen.

SS Queen Mary took out its transatlantic slotmachines after the bartenders complained it was killing their bar biz.

JFK popularized a new hotel-room prop, the rockingchair.

The president of the International Confederation of Actors' Unions, headquartered in Mexico City, suggested a simultaneous global series of radio and tv shows scoring Khrushchev for his "irresponsible atomic bomb experiments" as endangering the entire world, and thus bring it to the attention of all peoples, especially those behind the Bamboo and Iron Curtains. His point is that local entertainer favorites are closer to the people than political pronunciamentos.

Changing Scene

Douglas Leigh, the electric sign man, bought the N.Y. Times Tower for an Exhibition Hall (incidentally it experienced a tragic fire later in the year) and the Empire Bldg. was sold for $65,000,000.

New Gotham hotels and motels a-building (Hilton versus Loew-Tisches' Americana) among others.

U.S. in pitch to lure European tourists to this side of the Atlantic. Sears Roebuck and Montgomery Ward into the mailorder tourist business.

Arabs shun "Exodus," and Paul Newman joined the "tabu" list along with Elizabeth Taylor, Danny Kaye, et al.

Eddie Cantor's golden jubilee in show biz.

Mrs. Mary Hemingway's safari to Cuba to recover the late author's manuscripts at his finca outside of Havana. Old and sick the famed author shot himself.

Show biz's cold war fever generated some hot reaction in D.C. following Jack Paar's TV pickup at the Brandenburg Gate. (Ed Sullivan later originated two TV shows from West Berlin as entertainment for GIs). Paar's w.c. jokes also recalled. Guessing-game on Paar's successor at the NBC-TV conferences.

Brecht Boycott

As a result of the east-west tensions, late Communist Berthold Brecht's plays were cancelled in West Germany. One prominent East Berlin producer refused to return when that "wall" went up.

On the subject of Brecht, his "Threepenny Opera," derived from John Gay's 18th Century "Beggar's Opera," in collaboration with Kurt Weill and its American adaptation by Marc Blitzstein, finally ended its seventh off-Broadway season, clocking 2,611 performances. In the more than 6-years at the 299-seat Theatre de Lys, the 22 parts have been alternately filled by 709 players. "Mack The Knife" was projected into a smash disk by Bobby Darin, and in turn made him. Also, an offbeat interpolation into "Threepenny Opera" was "The Bilbao Song" which, too, made some disk impact.

Jazz took on new stature as groups, such as the Kansas City, Minneapolis, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Toledo Symphony Orchestras and the N. Y. Philharmonic, added modern jazz works by James Hall, James Giuffre, J. J. Johnson, John Lewis, et al.

Inevitably the Russian and American astronauts inspired Tin Pan Alley to such ditties as "Will There Be Space In My Space Ship?" This recalled L. Wolfe Gilbert's "Lucky Lindy," circa 1927, and he followed this up with "Astronaut of Space," dedicated to America's Alan B. Shepard this year (melody of Ben Oakland). The Kirby Stone Quartet's "AOK" was right in there with the topicalities, wherein a chick is invited to take a spin in "a capsule built for two."

The gospel jamborees, all-night singfests in Atlanta and elsewhere, with Mahalia Jackson, The Statesmen Quartet, the Blackwood Bros. Quartet, Oak Ridge Quartet, Florida Boys, et al. not only boomed their boxoffices but also their disk sales.

Mort Sahl, Bob Newhart, Charles Manna, Shelley Berman continued strong with their waxed humor. Newcomer Dick Gregory, unique as the "first" standup Negro comic to play before otay audiences, also made platter impact. In turn, this put new emphasis on Nipsey Russell and other colored comics whose orbits, heretofore, were circumscribed.

No Frontiers on Talent

The Inter-American Work Foundation, after a week-long convention in San Jose, Costa Rica, edicted a larger racial quota for proportional Negro representation on the American screen and tv.

This was followed by NAACP protestations in Hollywood along similar lines, with accent on nonmenial roles in feature films. The NAACP also planned a test of the Nevada Casino racial policy but, meantime, the "integrated" George Washington Carver Hotel & Casino in Las Vegas, despite its fronting by Harry Belafonte, Sammy Davis Jr., Joe Louis proved a quick flop.

American Broadcasting - Paramount Theatres' homeoffice on New York's West 66th St. was picketed and subjected to sit-in demonstrations, in protest against some of its affiliated Dixie theatres' segregation policies. Later, AB-PT's Chapel Hill Theatre broke the North Carolina Jim Crow rule, albeit only for card-carrying undergraduates. Two Austin (Texas) theatres also undertook a similarly "controlled" integration limited to "students only" at the Univ. of Texas. In Atlanta, the Metropolitan Opera management learned that four Negroes, holding down-front orchestra seats, had to view the opera from the balcony of the 4,600-seat Fox Theatre. Resultantly, Rudolf Bing ruled Met would no more play there under race barriers.

1961 Negro Advances

Nat King Cole during 1961 deplored minimal colored entertainment on television; only as occasional spot bookings on the variety programs. AGVA voted Sammy Davis Jr. as its "man of the year"

Legit & the Economy

What legit means to New York community welfare and industry was dramatized by the 10-day Equity strike in spring of 1961. Cost eating places around $5,000,000, according to the Restaurant League of New York. Hotels, garages, Times Square shops, etc., also suffered economically during that period.

A breakdown of the more than 8,000,000 legit patrons who saw the 46 shows on Broadway's 53 legit houses last year, indicated that 75% of the audiences live 15 miles from Manhattan and that the sum total gross boxoffice amounts to $41,000,000, exclusive of the overages for benefit of the theatre parties.

Incidentally, the theatre party is still the No. 1 factor in the economics of legit, though actors don't like the type of audiences who either (1) are more concerned with yoo-hooing at their friends and acquaintances, or (2) resent having paid $25, $50 or $100 as surcharge for sweet charity's sake.

Dramatists Guild recognized the economic stringencies and agreed to go along with certain modified royalty arrangements until production costs were recovered. Last year legit lost $2,000,000, and this season the total may be nearer $3,000,000 in light of pyramiding costs on other fronts. A show such as "Do Re Mi" cost $479,738 to bring in and, despite Phil Silvers and Nancy Walker heading the cast, is far from breaking-even despite its second-season run. "The Gay Life," introducing Italian leading man Walter Chiari to Broadway, is a similar top-cost ($480,000) musical.

The Pulitzer Prize play, "All The Way Home," lost $115,000 of its $150,000 capitalization but will get even thanks only to a Paramount Pictures deal. Meantime, the Hudson Theatre will become a garage.

Conrad Nagel was elected president of the 4A's (Associated Actors & Artistes of America), succeeding Paul Dulzell, named president emeritus, who has since passed away.

David Merrick continued the stormy petrel of legit while crying all the way to the bank with a succession of hits. In 1961 he lambasted critics (ranging from the N.Y. Times' Howard Taubman to The New Yorker's John McCarten).

Vinton Freedley unveiled the new $800,000 Actors' Fund of American home in Englewood, N.J.

"Twofers" (two-for-the-price-of-one) became an increasing vogue for the weak show. Also for the longrunning smashes as witness "My Fair Lady" into "twofers" at one time.

In 1961 Noel Coward did a bit of a comeback via "Sail Away."

"Fairest Lady" of 'Em All"

For the record, the "My Fair Lady" statistics include $50,200,000 b.o. up to the record-making period, of which $18,000,000 came from the original Broadway productions; $15,700,000 from the traveling national company, and $16,500,000 grossed by the foreign productions.

The $5,500,000 lease of the film rights for seven years to Warner Bros. is another new high mark, plus a percentage of the profits. Peak pix rights price heretofore has been $2,000,000.

On the Wednesday matinee in June when "My Fair Lady" clocked the 2,213th performance, that topped "Oklahoma!" by one, Michael Allanson, who now portrays Prof. Higgins (role created by Rex Harrison) so announced it from the stage of the Mark Hellinger Theatre and champagne was served. Later in the year, on Aug. 14, 1961, when "MFL" hit 2,239 performances to pass "Chu-Chin-Chow," this made it the longest-running legit musical in history.

London critics named "Music Man" the best 1961 musical with "Sound of Music" and "King-Kong," latter the South African show, runners-up. The best native British musical was voted "Beyond the Fringe."

"Music Man," for example, has a better-than-$3,000,000 net profit already on its original $310,000 production investment. David Merrick's "Carnival" got back its $250,000 production investment after 15 weeks. "How To Succeed" etc., got even on its $350,000 investment on its 20th week.

Those new high-style coiffeurs irking theatre managers and public alike who yearn for those yesteryear signs, "Ladies Will Kindly Remove Their Hats," although "heads" should be substituted when some top-gloss babe does the theatre bit sporting one of those Eiffel Tower creations.

Road legit experienced a further b.o. fizzle with twilight curtain-raising time.

The historic Old Howard, Boston, razed by fire last June, may become a museum under local civic auspices. The 160-year-old playhouse has played everything from Edwin Booth to burlesque.

Industrial ballyhoo via legit culture sees the new ultra Fisher Theatre, Detroit, taking its place with the O'Keefe Centre, Toronto, Pittsburgh may get a new Alcoa Theatre in the same tradition.

Other Mores

Despite the muggings, the reefers, and the juvenile (and adult) delinquencies, a religioso revival has boomed the revival singers and gospel recordings. This is in contrast to the "party" records (rougher and franker than ever) which also boomed and, in turn, created new markets for practitioners of the Belle Barth.

RUNAWAY: PICTURES, TABU WORDS & HAIR-DOS

Rusty Warren and Woody Woodbury ilk.

The disk biz, while downbeating the singles, boomed the album market, with result that the major diskeries were more prominently financially interested in bankrolling new legit musicals such as "How To Succeed In Business Without Really Trying," "Milk and Honey," "Kean," "What's In It For Me?," "We Take The Town," "Subways Are For Sleeping," "The Gay Life," "Let It Ride." In turn this seemed to accelerate the dislegging manufacturers of bootleg albums.

The Blogs

The 1961 biographies (by and/or about) included Sir Cedric Hardwicke, Jack Paar, Elizabeth Taylor, Loretta Young, Maurice Chevalier, Marlene Dietrich, Harpo Marx, Connie Clausen, Molly Berg, Gene Fowler, Laurel & Hardy, Renata Tebaldi, Candy Jones, Garry Davis, Gracie Fields, Clark Gable (three of them), Hugh Downs, Alexander King, Louis Nizer, Maria Callas, Nellie Melba.

The Jack Benny High School took its place in his native Waukegan, Ill., along with the Thomas Jefferson H.S. and the Daniel Webster H.S. Benny, now 67, dropped out of Waukegan High when he was a soph.

A U.S. Gold Medal of Merit was "proposed" for Louis Armstrong, Bob Hope and Danny Kaye, but action thereon was tabled until 1962. In London, U.S. Ambassador David Bruce bestowed the Golden Plate Award on Bob Hope for his international achievements.

Soon after arriving on the Coast, comedian Frank Fay was ruled mentally incompetent by a San Francisco court but the comedian died shortly thereafter, leaving a $400,000 estate to church and other charities, though VARIETY carried an item from California that his adopted son (when married to Barbara Stanwyck) might have a claim under the laws of that state.

Paging Arthur Murray

Late in the year The Twist focused attention on other teenage dances. Dick Clark, who showcased Chubby Checker's "The Twist," states that "The Fly" may be the next teen vogue, although that doesn't appear likely since the socialites and other adults took up The Twist and gave it fullest maturity. However, The Slop, The Jet, the Bob, the Switch-a-Roo, the Messaround and the Hully-Gully are other billings for what are substantially variations of the Lindy-Hop.

The Twist kayoed the pachanga although the latter had a vogue for a spell.

"Never On Sunday" was the year's global smash with some 10,000,000 disk sales in over 30 different versions and many languages.

The Twist and the jazz rooms created a "day club" vogue for some of the niteries, with weekend midday bashes helping swell the gross and also attracting the teenage and family trade.

As the Performing Rights Society (Britain) reported a 300% rise in its 1960 take of $9,226,000, the British songsmiths pitched for a 65% quota favoring homegrown pop song material on the British airwaves. This, of course, hasn't curbed the UK audience reaction to Presley, Anka, Darin, Connie Francis, Bobby Rydell, Brook Benton, et al.

On the U. S. front the dwindling singles market wasn't bolstered much by converting the conventional 45 to 33 rpm, consistent with the albums, but the latter continued strong in sales. However, in the PX's abroad the GIs spent over $15,000,000 for singles and albums.

Frank Sinatra, on his own Reprise label, after departing Capitol, and Harry Belafonte (RCA Victor), joined other top artists in completely owning their own wax works, merely licensing them to this or that manufacturer. The show albums have been doing that for some time.

Mitch Miller's Click

Along with the unpredictables of show biz has been the click of the Mitch Miller Sing-Along tv show, cueing a renaissance of music-o-variety programs and, in turn, proving a bonanza to the old-line music publishers whose hoary standards — solidly entrenched evergreens—are earning unexpected revenues from such tv performances, album revivals, and the like.

The Broadway Assn. presented its Gold Medal to Richard Rodgers for providing so much mirth and melody to the White Way. This came on top of his and the late Oscar Hammerstein's "Sound of Music" (Columbia) making the third R&H original show album to pass the million-mark in sales; the other two were "Oklahoma" and "South Pacific."

Richard Rodgers writing his own lyrics, following death of longtime partner Oscar Hammerstein, for "No Strings," another interracial-themed legit musical. Book is by playwright Samuel Taylor. Ditto on the added "State Fair" (20th-Fox Film) remake, but after Frederick Loewe's decision to "take it easier" Rodgers and Alan Jay Lerner announced a 1962-63 musical collaboration. Loewe, too, reversed field and is working on a new project.

As disk jockeys' impact was curbed, the publishers who at first screamed over payola now deplored the "music librarian" and "music committee" methods at the radio stations because they lacked the adventure of the deejays who, at least, "exposed" and plugged those new singles they favored.

ASCAP hit a new peak $32,344,135 annual income last year and also modified its bylaws to permit Stanley Adams, incumbent president, to continue uninterruptedly because of the job he has been doing.

The pitch for a revised Copyright Act to bring the 1909 statute up to more realistic appraisal of the new values brought about by electronic and other broader methods of music reproduction and dissemination continues.

Repatriates & Runaways

Along with "runaway" production the past year witnessed a trek back to Broadway of such filmsters as Jack Lemmon, Lucille Ball, Anthony Quinn, Claudette Colbert, Bette Davis, Richard Burton, William Bendix, Angela Lansbury, Gig Young, Don Ameche, Frank Lovejoy, Lee Tracy, Michael Rennie, Henry Fonda, Melvyn Douglas, Roddy McDowell, Ann Bancroft, Nancy Olsen, Walter Pidgeon, Martha Scott, Celeste Holm, Aline MacMahon, Hugh O'Brian, Keith Andes, Sydney Chaplin and Lillian Gish among others.

Second-generation youngsters figuring negatively in the news included Lana Turner's daughter, Cheryl, 17; the late Bob Bazooka Burns' 22-year-old Barbara, on a narcotics jam; Bobby Driscoll, 24, a 1949 "special" Academy Award winner, now a construction laborer, on ditto; John Barrymore Jr., Edward G. Robinson Jr. and Charles Chaplin Jr., on drunk charges; Jackie Coogan ("The Kid," with Chaplin), now 46, on alleged narcotics and later drunk charge, and also his 19-year-old son, John, arrested with two others for allegedly photographing and selling pictures of nude teenage girls. Miss Burns died Jan. 1 of an overdose of barbiturates.

More Tidbits

Here were other news items of the year now ended:

"Axis Sally" (Mildred Gillars, 60, and a former actress) convicted of treason in 1949 and sentenced to 10-30 years, was paroled.

Liberace was estimated as earning $1,000,000 last year on personals, here and abroad, despite no television, film or smash disk.

Showman Joshua Logan voted Churchill, at 87, "the only man alive who can take the spotlight away from Khrushchev, even at his age." DeGaulle also credited by tv and press as "putting on a great show and he might even be able to steal a few scenes from K." President Kennedy was voted "not enough of a ham; even when he is really angry, the whole performance has a New England reserve about it." Castro voted "a fabulous actor."

During 1961 came Otto Harbach's 80th birthday. Carl Sandburg hit 84. (Adolph Zukor is 89 this month.)

Judy Garland was a comeback in 1961.

George Jessel had a "farewell" tour.

Liz Taylor fought for her life, while the world watched and many prayed.

Dispute raged as to teach-vee (educational television) and the yes-or-no on feevee (tollvision) versus freevee.

Art heists on the Riviera and elsewhere were sensational. Ditto fancy art auction prices, latter given showmanship via special invites and closed-circuit tv.

Eichmann videotapes jetted from Israel to global outlets at the end of each daily proceeding.

Coronet magazine in foldo after 25 years. Saturepost and Life's new look. McCall's 8,000,000 circulation versus Ladies' Home Journal. Redbook and Good Housekeeping.

A daughter to Sammy Davis Jr. and Mai Britt.

Al Capone estate lawyer in Chicago no like those nasty films and tv scripts, threatening libel suits.

Bill Orr was named head of WB production by father-in-law Jack L. Warner.

Leningrad Ballet star Rudolf Nureyev defected from the company, while in Paris. Since then Russian secret police traveling with ballet and kindred companies to curb similar jumps. Nureyev has completed his touring with Marquis de Cuevas Ballet. May be seen in U. S. during 1962.

More to the Soviet taste, Russia's astronaut hero, Major Yuri A. Gagarin, made the first direct live telecast from the Soviet Union to Great Britain, via the BBC.

Still more: Enos the chimpanaut. Castro's tractors-for-prisoners exchange idea. British to Kuwait's rescue after the Iraq's invasion of the oil-rich sheikdom. Nehru's doubletalking (and double-dealing) peace propaganda and India's quick blitz of the Portuguese enclaves (Goa, etc.). The New York transit strike. Continue Biblical and Graeco-Roman spectacle films.

Global TV is predicted for 1964 via a series of satellite boosters. It is hoped that the Tokyo Olympics will be seen globally on tv via direct pickup rather than the jet-and-tape technique which, of course, was an equally signal achievement.

NBC-RCA's color progress in 1962 augurs tinting-up by the other networks, and the Tokyo games also have tintvision on their horizon.

Army Bluenoses

Army brass insistence upon "audition" of top Yank stars offering to entertain U.S. troops in Europe irked many and caused Jack Carter to sound off that, as a seasoned comedian, he knows good taste as well as anybody.

British team, Norman Sturgis and Laura James, personally protested to President Kennedy that their act at U.S. Air Force bases in Britain was censored because it included a lampoon titled "John and Jackie at Home, or How White Is My House."

U's Golden Anni

Universal marked the 50th anni of the company's founding by Carl Laemmle, and Milton R. Rackmil & Co. took advantage of the occasion for some upped billings with the new product selling season.

Joe E. Levine anticipated the ebbing of the spear-and-sandal cycle (beefcake Steve Reeves) and shifted part of his production activities to Hollywood, but that didn't diminish the Hollywood crafts taking their plight to Governmental ears on the "runaway" production platform.

New USIA boss, Ed Murrow, ex-CBS, lent a sympathetic ear and also decried Hollywood's "mayhem and lust" cycle as "giving America a negative image in the global scheme of things." To this, the more realistic filmsters wondered how come that when the French and Italians make with the sex pix there's no such hue-and-cry.

Also, that it is for obvious authentic backgrounds; governmental subsidies and other economies that the majors produced "Ben-Hur" (Rome), "Kings of Kings" (Spain), "El Cid" (Spain), Zanuck's "Longest Day" (Normandy), Sam Spiegel's "Lawrence of Arabia" (Jordan), Billy Wilder's "One, Two, Three" (Munich), John Huston's "Freud" (Vienna and Munich), "Suzie Wong" (Hong Kong), etc., because they can be done better in those locales than on the Coast.

Lots of Bounty

One off-Hollywood film that didn't beat the production rap, because of unpredictable delays, is "Mutiny on the Bounty." It is estimated this Metro film will wind up with a $20,000,000 investment, the champ alltime production cost. Prior thereof Metro's "Ben-Hur" topped $15,500,000, made largely in Rome, but its boxoffice performance since has more than substantiated the gamble.

Sam Bronston's not-so-costly "King of Kings," which Metro took over for release, experienced some captious criticism in the press and from clerical sources on its supposed "rewrite" of the Bible.

'Never On Sunday'

Opposing the multimillion dollar blockbusters the trade points to the Greek-made "Never On Sunday" (Jules Dassin's film starring Melina Mercouri) costing $150,000 which will gross $4,000,000 in the U.S. alone; the Italian "Two Women," a $100,000 investment; and the British spy picture, "The Risk," budgeted at $150,000.

"La Dolce Vita," of course, is in a class by itself as a costlier Italian film which, however, because of its impact at the European film festivals and boxoffices has been cannily merchandised on a "hard-ticket" (reserved-seat) basis to excellent returns. Incidentally, la dolce vita has passed into the language as a way of life.

Sol A. Schwartz succeeds Sam Briskin as Columbia Pictures production head.

Preston R. (Bob) Tisch succeeds Eugene Picker as president of Loew Theatres & Hotels, while Laurence Alan Tisch is prez of the parent Loew's. Picker since joined U.A. as a veepee.

Wall Streeters Milton S. Gould and John L. Loeb in re Spyros Skouras and the 20th-Fox situation, including the long-delayed "Cleopatra"; Elizabeth Taylor's illness; the hassle with Lloyds of London on the insurance; the ultimate scrapping of George Stevens' "The Greatest Story"; and Darryl Zanuck's shifting of his "The Chapman Report" from 20th to WB release. Stevens' excoriation of "bankers trying to run Hollywood production."

U.S. Labor Secretary Arthur Goldberg to the rescue of the Metropolitan Opera.

Maria Beale Fletcher, 19, the new Miss America, turned out to be a former Radio City Music Hall Rockette. Her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Beale Fletcher, danced professionally as Beale & Peggy.

The Congo strife revived the State Dept. gag for a new tv show there titled "Eat The Press."

New Madison Sq. Garden planned to top Pennsylvania Station.

A fuss of the year was "that word" in "The Connection," U.S. indie pic, which won a special notice in Cannes and has since been denied a N.Y. State exhibition license.

Trade pro and con that "certain b.o. stars worth all they can get," while others can't see the wisdom, if the picture business is to survive, in deals such as $1,000,000 for Elizabeth Taylor, plus 50% of the net profit (WB). Latter also paying $5,500,000, plus percentage, for "My Fair Lady." Some stars' "script and almost every other control" is another pro-and-con point of discussion.

Relaxing the Code

Relaxing of the industry's self-regulation Production Code further was aproved by Motion Picture Assn. of America prexy Eric Johnston who discreetly okayed themes of sex perversion and aberration "if treated with care, discretion and restraint and if pertinent to the plot."

After "Room At The Top," "Butterfield 8," "The Man With The Golden Arm," "Never On Sunday" and "Suddenly Last Summer" it was inevitable that films dealing with homos would have to get a relaxed ruling.

In '61 "Hollywood Reds" situation was off and on. "The Hollywood 10" suing for blacklisting and the charges of undercover deals by many producers with the blacklistees. Nedrick Young's billing; ditto Dalton Trumbo on "Exodus" and "Spartacus," and latterly the American Legion's blast anew at Trumbo because of his screenplaying James A. Michener's "Hawaii."

Newton's 'Wasteland'

New FCC Chairman Newton N. Minow's "I-kiddie-you-not" pronunciamento made every network juvenile show-minded, just as his initial "vast wasteland" diatribe quickly resulted in the three networks beefing up their news and public affairs programs. Of these the most redoubtable is the Huntley-Brinkley show. Pubaffair programs in prime time, unfortunately, did not get the ratings.

Minow's "vast wasteland" crack pointed up 1955 as the Golden Age of TV when its original dramas (Philco Playhouse, Studio One, etc.) and its nascent teleplaywrights and teleproducers (Rod Serling, Paddy Chayefsky, Tad Mosel, Gore Vidal, Robert Alan Aurthur, Fred Coe, George Shaeffer) held sway. (Since then, Minow has conceded that TV is coming out of the "wasteland".)

Meantime, such longtime video staples as Ralph Edwards' "This Is Your Life," "Wyatt Earp," "Bat Masterson," "Peter Gunn," "Michael Shayne," Tennessee Ernie Ford, Dave Garroway (John Chancellor replaced him on NBC's morning show) and Loretta Young bit the dust along with a number of cowboys-and-Indians shows, private-eyes and situation comedies.

The three-network pool of the Cape Canaveral astronaut launching on May 8, when Alan B. Shepard, Jr. became America's first astronaut, was excellent although this, too, resulted in some captious criticism because certain vidtape footage had been integrated to give the feeling of actuality. AOK passed into the language.

With payola and plugola minimized, Brooklyn District Attorney Edward Silver envisioned a plugola in reverse when he addressed the American Bar Assn. convention in St. Louis, pointing to the "Perry Mason" show as allegedly "downgrading law enforcement" because, every Saturday night, over CBS-TV, the d.a. was shown prosecuting seemingly innocent people and, or the plot motivation invariably proved, via defense attorney Perry Mason, that the innocent people had been indicted and only his perspicacity uncovered the real culprits.

Shuffling the clock continues as the major numbers game with the Mad Ave. boys because, no matter how you slice it, it's the hour, along with what's before-and-after, that makes for ratings. Generally agreed that the champ time-slot is 8-9 p.m., when nearly 30,000,000 homes, with perhaps 70-99,000,000 viewers, can be captured.

Trouble All Over

Bingo swept Britain, now a $112,000,000 annual business and hurting the boxoffice. In Australia the "poker clubs"—slotmachines which pay off on poker hands, as against the conventional lemons, bars and clusters of the Las Vegas genre—were similarly affecting the b.o.

Internal Revenue being more sympathetic to any proposed legislation that would spread the income of stars, athletes and others who earn most of it in a few concentrated years. But Senator Albert Gore still adamant against those "Swiss tax havens" and also scored Hollywood's "runaway productions which have made the former film capital into a ghost town."

"Nasty Nazi" film cycle in Germany seeing a sequel among Italian producers with "Fascist exposes."

me, don't worry about that. I'll scare up some more talent to round out young Jack's program."

The evening arrived, and the Harvard freshman beer night was at Memorial Hall, a structure built in memory of valiant Harvard men who had died in the Civil War. The great entertainment bill that had been assembled consisted of Sally Rand, Dizzy Dean and me. (Sally was in Boston to address some convention; Dizzy was in town because the St. Louis Cards were playing the old Boston Braves. I was in town because I lived there). Dizzy went on first. He was tired, but he slithered or sluthered through a highly satisfactory routine.

I came on and gave what a generous VARIETY review might have called an infectious talk to the younger fry. But the Harvard freshmen were wondering what's become of Sally who traipsed out for the finale, fully clothed in Ivy League style (femme).

The boys thought it was a gag. But Sally went into a spiel about "the projection of personality." (That's the topic she'd been lecturing on earlier. She later explained to me that when she'd been invited to speak at Harvard, she felt it was her "message" that should get through). But when the boys started yelling, "Take 'em off, Sally," and she haughtily refused, some of the more uncouth Harvardians started fossing empty beercans toward the rostrum. Decorum, however, shortly ensued.

And that, dear readers, is how I first met the one who is now our President.

Before that, however, I had met his father, Joseph P. Kennedy, in the Harvard Yard (not campus; that's for Yale). He was a senior; I was a freshman. But J.P.K. was the sort of person who'd extend a greeting hand to anyone who looked honest or Irish. Another member of that Harvard 1912 class was Robert C. Benchley, who then was editor of the Harvard Lampoon, the comic magazine. His masterpiece, as a Lampooner, was a drawing of a man with one torso, two heads, four arms and four legs. Its title: "Amen."

Kennedy's Fred Stone Pix

Joe Kennedy, now worth $400,000,000 according to a Fortune magazine estimate, was slugged financially on his first incursion to the movies. He figured that Fred Stone, who was smasheroo in musical comedy, would be the same in the films. Bum guess. But Joe went ahead and financed two full-length pictures of the erstwhile "Wizard of Oz." Some months later he asked me to see him at a modest, roll-top desk at the Hayden Stone brokerage house in Boston, and said he had two lemons in his lap. And would I try to rewrite and improve the subtitles, and get him out of the bucket. I tried, but even good subtitles can't make a swan out of a skunk. J.P.K. lost $160,000 on the Fred Stone venture.

But he was not cured—a few years later he bought a British company called F.B.O., not to be confused with FBI, which son Bobby now controls. F.B.O. stood for Film Booking Office. Its Hollywood lot is now headquarters for Desilu. In 1925, when I became a subtitle writer out there, $40,000 was the budget for the average full-length picture. Sometimes, when they spent $75,000 or $80,000 for the film, it was called a Gold Bond picture and commanded a higher rental.

Cutrating the Ameche

Joe Kennedy's F.B.O. enterprise was then operated so economically that his top executives in Hollywood often would repair to the studio at 9:30 p.m. to await a phone call from Joe in New York, where it was then 12:30 a.m. and he could obtain a slightly lower phone rate.

From early youth I had a yen for the stage. Why should I, at age 17, be buying green-covered VARIETY at 10c a copy if I were not show-minded? So anyway, I studied hard and landed at Harvard, and, in my latter years there, entered the then famous Prof. Baker's playwriting course, through whose doors had previously passed Eugene O'Neill, Edward Sheldon and Sidney Howard. I didn't make it as a playwright, though, but I did nudge into writing "material," as it was called, for vaudeville performers. For such acts as Phil Baker, Julius Tannen, Billy Glason, Emma Carus, the Four Mortons and George Yeomans (& Lizzie). I contributed humor—but could still darn near starve. Having aspired to playwriting and gravitated to vaude gags, I swerved around the corner and went into humor columning for the N.Y. Evening World. The first time I met Walter Winchell was at the old NVA Club on 46th St., he was collecting items for the Vaudeville News at $35 or $40 a week at the time—I forget which, but he was still happy to be off the circuits for weekly money scrivening.

Dempsey Wasn't Laughing

One morning, some years ago, I went into the office of the McNaught Syndicate, which still handles my column, and Will Rogers was laughing in high glee with Charlie McAdam, the syndicate's head man. It seems the Internal Revenue Service had finally allowed newspapers to print the tax paid by anyone in excess of $15,000 income. And many newspapers were running page after page of the returns. What Rogers was laughing at was that Jack Dempsey, for the previous year, had paid more in income taxes than J. P. Morgan. (Bill, too, had probably paid more than J.P., but he wasn't laughing at himself).

At the Republican national convention of 1924 in Cleveland, Will Rogers, William Jennings Bryan and I were covering the event for McNaught, and naturally we had seats in the press benches together. By the time the convention was rapped to order for the first session, I found myself between the two Bills, Rogers and Bryan. They had never met till then. So across my chin I heard this conversation: BRYAN (sententiously) "Well, Mr. Rogers, I assume you're here to report anything humorous about this convention. If I hear of anything humorous I'll give it to you." ROGERS—"Thanks, Mr. Bryan; and if I hear anything serious about this roundup, I'll slip it to you."

As an actor of sorts, for one week only, in 1924 I did a monolog at the B. F. Keith two-a-day house in Boston. Jack Norworth headed the bill and was kind enough to apply the little makeup he thought I needed—a touch of carpenter's pencil on my upper eyelids. The pit leader, Bart Grady, at Monday morning rehearsal, gave me one tidbit of advice. When I took my stance at centre-stage at Monday matinee, he warned me, "Don't look up at that spotlight—it'll blind you." So of course, being an amateur—and a nervous one—that's just what I did. I looked up. But anyway, I knew the audience was out there despite my temporary blindness, and I remembered my lines. So I got by that opening matinee and the succeeding performances, and pocketed that $500 at the week's end. (I mean $475—there was that 5% commission in those days). And that concluded my thespic career.

Ghosting For Sherwood

During seven years at Harvard, the last three of which were spent in Prof. Baker's playwriting course, I came to know a six-foot-seven-inches undergraduate by the name of Robert E. Sherwood. He, like Bob Benchley before him, was an editor of the Lampoon, and a fellow of talents, with a facility for writing verse. He was also a member of the famed Hasty Pudding Club and aspired to be a coauthor of its usual spring show. The music was to be written by another Hasty Puddinger, Sam Sears, but Sherwood estimated that twirling off the lyrics would be the limit of his talent. He wasn't so sure of himself for the dialog and plot. So he made this proposition to me: "Look, you're in Baker's course and you know all about writing a play. Would you mind writing the book of this show, and letting me submit it in the contest under my name?" Well, it was agreed. There was no compensation involved—I did it for the exercise. The name of the opus was "Barnum Was Right," and it won the contest, and was duly produced—with success, I might modestly add.

So this all secretly conferred on me the distinction of having ghostwritten the first play of a friend who was later to be one of America's most distinguished playwrights, Robert Emmet Sherwood.

And this is as good a spot to conclude. Thanks for having read it—in case you got this far.

the President's father), violin virtuoso Isaac Stern expressed himself that U.S. lags on a cultural level, as compared with many a European nation, and not only Russia.

Tolvision

Pay-see proponents are heartened periodically when such top events as the Floyd Patterson-Ingamar Johansson fisticuffs can gross $2,400,000 via closed-circuit. Some 470,000 admissions in 207 theatres and arenas, at an average admission of about $5 (some charge $6 and $7, and a Heart Fund Benefit at Madison Square Garden fetched $100-a-ticket donation to the same event). But this is the big exception thus far.

Paramount's Telemeter experiments in West Toronto, Canada, are still inconclusive and, many feel, not very convincing. Nonetheless, Great Britain is high on the potential of tollvision. On the other hand, the UK networks, commercial and BBC, are also geared for colorcasting which is expected to snowball even further in 1962-63.

UA reissued its Oscar-winners, "The Apartment" and "Elmer Gantry" and gained some boffo b.o. anew. This year's Academy Awards telecast was estimated as having been watched by 63,900,000 or 7% less audience than last year's 67,600,000 lookers.

Niteries

The national nitery scene is in constant flux. About the only consistency of late has been The Twist as a hypo to many a spot, first as an off-Monday or Tuesday "added attraction" but soon spread generally as a b.o. hypo.

The Miami Beach pattern has shifted from names to revues, a la the Las Vegas rooms, which hasn't made the agents too happy because the fixed shows don't tend to change act bookings or play even quasi-"names."

The strip vogue has extended from Canada to any number of the midwest key cities; some of these booming factory towns now enjoy more night life than heretofore, and many of the same strip and B-girl genre.

This in turn has interested the McClellan Congressional subcommittee to probe alleged underworld nitery ties with acts and, for that reason, the American Guild of Variety Artists has been quizzed among others.

Rank or Associated British circuits, he has to fight it out the hard way by selling directly to the independents. Time was, not so long ago, when there were four circuits — Odeon, Gaumont, ABC and the fourth circuit which was pioneered by 20th Fox after their post-Cinemascope split with Rank. The fourth circuit has long since been disbanded; under the Rank rationalisation program, the Odeon and Gaumont pattern was revised and that group now operates the major Rank chain and allied its other theatres to become part of the National Circuit. Last summer John Davis had to admit there was widespread reluctance on the part of producers and distributors to let their product go out on the national release and now it is an outlet of minor significance.

These drastic changes in the booking system have taken their toll of some independent productions, but it is a strange economic twist that notwithstanding the declining attendances and fewer theatres, successful films are doing as well, if not better, than in the past. There is one outstanding example in the last year: "Guns of Navarone" has emerged as the all-time British film champ, a mantle held previously by Sam Spiegel's "Bridge on the River Kwai." And not just by a narrow margin either. If present estimates are confirmed, it will end up at least $700,000 ahead and, even allowing for remission of admission tax, that is a substantial advance. A number of other British films have also chalked up significant grosses through the year, but most important of all is the continuing success of the major long-running blockbusters.

"South Pacific" is now well in its fourth year first run at the Dominion and shows no sign of giving way for "Porgy and Bess," which has been standing in line for more than two years. "Ben-Hur," just starting its third year, successfully survived the transfer from the Empire to the Royalty and is still bringing in handsome grosses each week. Cinerama has been at Casino for about seven years, and currently a revival of the first production, "This Is Cinerama," is yielding hefty returns. Newcomers to the West End scene, such as "King of Kings" and "El Cid" (both out of the Samuel Bronston stable) also give every indication of highly profitable engagements.

To quote the title of a current London legit hit: "Fings Ain't Wot They Used T'Be"—but they are certainly much healthier than many insiders anticipated a year or two ago.

Put Heat On Legits' 'Ice'

the daily press — that medium which is still in a preferred position despite all its tawdriness, to magazines, books and movies.

But now our theatre exists in an economic market place of dire perils. Therefore, it is not surprising that many honorable citizens are urging the use of Government funds to finance this form of expression. Men of good will can easily differ on the issue: Can we in our youthful culture feel content that Government financing will not lead to Government controls of content, themes of plays or even selection of the skilled people who are the theatre? Have we a tradition which will separate the power of the purse from those subtle impacts usually so compatible with our national dollar folkway?

For my part I oppose Government financing at this time on very different grounds. The theatre is concentrated in New York City, save only for that great renaissance of amateur productions throughout the cities and villages of our Republic. Road companies have virtually disappeared compared to several decades ago. Millions of our children have never seen a live (professional) actor.

For reasons clear but not relevant to this brief comment theatres are not usually rented without the boxoffice employees. This is deemed valid since theatres are rented on a contingency basis—percentum of gross sales of tickets.

But, to our disgrace, the theft at the boxoffice is estimated as high as $15,000,000 each year. A minimum figure is $5,000,000. No other business in our buccaneer culture condones such thievery. "Ice" is unique to our theatre, and the technique is easy, and it's evaporation requires no great skill.

The Artifice of 'Ice'

The Art of Ice depends on a simple ingredient. One person, in the boxoffice, after an opening night, looks over the shoulder of someone in the upper echelons of the Producing Company and jointly they read the dramatic review in the N. Y. Times, which determines—no doubt to the Times' partial regret—the anticipated length of the line at the boxoffice the next morning. If it's a hit, $10,000 taken out of safety deposit boxes can purchase a small but valuable package of tickets at the boxoffice ticket-stamped price. A thousand tickets can fit into coatpockets or in a lady's handbag.

These are the tickets, purchased at $7 to $9 a piece, that are resold at $15 to $30 a pair or even apiece through some anonymous quiet soul sitting at a phone in an office with no name on the door in any of our skyscrapers. Any big corporation can on the eve of a performance—or at least a day or two before—buy two to 30 tickets in the cold market of another kind of Frozen Food—"Iced" Tickets. And why not—tax deductible by the corporate buyer!

I suggest that this embezzling folkway is quite deeply rooted and so generally accepted by the most honorable of producers and theatreowners, with maybe only one eye closed, that the Theatre as an economic entity appears to be resigned to allowing those millions, that should go to writers, actors, musicians, backers, directors and all those who "make" a hit, to find their stealthy way into the probably undisclosed bank accounts of a few people who create nothing and add less than nothing to the making of a hit.

It can't be stopped is the cry of many who don't want it halted. I'm not persuaded that Gov. Rockefeller's income tax officials are not as smart as the robbing rogues.

Worth A Try

Others say it's inevitable so long as there are hits which meet more favor than there are seats in the house.

This seems to me to be sheer rationalization. Let's experiment.

For example, why resist the overwhelming forces of supply and demand? Why not let the theatre-owner and the company get the benefit now accruing to nameless black market beneficiaries?

One of the wise wealthy business backers of shows and owner of brick and mortar, called a Theatre, only recently approved an oft-discussed technique. On a hit, hold out that number of tickets which might meet the wishes of those who will pay premium prices for the privilege of deciding on the day of curtain rising, that they must have the choicest seats. Tickets could be so marked at the higher prices and the prices could decline as the hit fades and the demand declines.

Any time any one of the guilds or unions or groups of financial backers wants some extra millions to help finance the theatre, no mayor or government could refuse to clean up this sorry mess.

Of course the thieving involves only hit shows, but think what the theatre as a whole could do with a small portion of present "ice" to convert the boondoggling of craftsmen engaged in production into respectable pension or unemployment plans — preserving the dignity of those who had to organize against the theatre monopolists of 30 years ago, and still provide unemployment insurance or old age pensions without pricing the theatre out of the market. I suggest that less than 5% of the inhabitants of Greater New York go to theatre more than once a year, and then only for the tail-end of hit shows. Not unlike the taxi-riding public which is less than 2% of our citizens—except for trips to hospitals or for trips to stations and airports.

I should fear that if the Government should go into the subsidy business at this time, they will unwittingly perpetuate Ice since the Government funds are not likely to be used to finance hit shows. To the extent that the Government—state or Federal—finances the worthy but unpopular, the unsubsidized commercial profit-making theatre will find that the Hit-Iced productions will become an ever greater proportion of the total commercial theatre. Thus the pressure to eliminate Ice will diminish. Let us first eliminate this odd form of business corruption and then get a clearer vision as to the merits of subsidies.

Without criticism of any present official, our Governor (Rockefeller, N. Y.), who has greater powers than the Mayor, and holds the theatre in high esteem, should be approached by Actors Equity and all the guilds concerned with the theatre to come to grips with Ice—the dishonor of all of us who wish to expand the theatre as a free antidote to the newer mass media which seems to be committed to lowest common denominators in the competition between quality and quantity.

nier, antedated this stunt by ten years, in 1915, which itself was antedated two years before, in 1913, by Max Reinhardt in his film, "Venetian Nights," from a scenario by Karl Voellmoeller. (How recherche can you get?)

Doug Fairbanks in "The Thief of Bagdad" threw powder from a magic box with which to create an army in that memorable fantasy. Did he or did he not know that Jason in the old Greek legend of the Golden Fleece threw stones on the ground from which an army sprang up as a result? Zoroasterism has it that this was how man was created, by angels throwing stones over their shoulders and where a stone fell there a man appeared, which is to say that man is no more than a thing of chance.

The Spanish government has not only banned Bunuel's "Viridiana" but threatened to boycott any country's films (with which it has reciprocal agreements) if such countries show it. France has already acceded. The U. S. is apparently not involved, on a technicality. But this is old stuff with Spain. In 1937 they not only banned Von Sternberg's "Devil is a Woman", but forced Paramount to destroy the negative.

Apropos "Viridiana," it's a searing film but Bunuel (the original angry young man) said it all and much stronger in his 1930 "L'Age d'Or," banned practically everywhere. Compare Fellini's juxtaposition of Christ vs. the girls in bikinis at the beginning of "La Dolce Vita" with the scene of Christ and the girl at the end of "L'Age d'Or." (There's a print at the George Eastman House in Rochester.)

"On the set they call me Mr. Meticulous," said Ross Hunter, producer of "Flower Drum Song." "I want everything to be real . . . People are much more aware of what they see on the screen today . . . they can tell the real from the artificial." Said by Von Stroheim 40 years ago.

"New York is becoming more and more like Sodom and Gomorrah —anti-natural," remarked Hans Richter, the pioneer film experimentor, recently. "Those arrogant skyscrapers going up everywhere . . . there isn't a mountain on earth with such sheer walls, even Everest. Their heights are not attained by a natural grace but are arbitrary." Which recalls Rodin's dictum, "All art that has not its roots in nature is false."

Little, indeed, is new under the sun . . .

Listen to Ravel's "Ondine" and then to the last third of Schelling's "Nocturne a Raguza". (Who remembers that one?)

Recall the last scene of Milestone's "All Quiet on the Western Front" where the soldier reaches from his trench for a flower, the famous scene with the soldier's hand (played, incidentally, by director Milestone himself) and then remember still further back (some six years before that) when Vidor first did it with John Gilbert in the shell-hole scene of "The Big Parade."

Who would have thought, for instance, that seven years before "The Blue Angel" there was a German film in which both Emil Jannings and Marlene Dietrich appeared: "Tragoedie der Liebe," directed by Joe May. (Miss Dietrich, of course, had only a bit part then.)

"I'll never sell "Wuthering Heights" for a remake," said Sam Goldwyn. "To me it is the perfect movie, and I won't have it tampered with." Which echoes what Willa Cather once said about her stories when she set a blanket refusal for their filming by anyone.

And the producing company of Orson Welles' still unseen here "Mr. Arkadin" (a bizarre and fascinating film in its original version), who complained in a suit against the celebrated actor-director that his "excessive drinking on and off the set" put a great strain on everybody and ran a 10-week job into 16 months, reminds one of what Lincoln answered to complaints of Gen. Ulysses Grant's drunkenness, "Find out the brand he drinks," said the President, "and see that all my generals are well supplied with it."

A Pat Title: 'The Illegals'

"This is not a film," he said, "it's a pilgrimage."

So I got another cameraman, Jean Paul Alphen, himself a concentration camp survivor. Alphen didn't mind the rough conditions.

We were arrested, now and again, by Americans, Russians, British. The scariest time was when the Russians held us incommunicado for 30 hours, in Vienna. But a cleaning-woman gave us a keen look, and half an hour later, an American officer suddenly turned up and got us released.

As we crossed Europe, we cached parts of our undeveloped negative in Prague, in Vienna, in Rome, fearing confiscation at any point. Finally, one weird night in Italy, we were led to a desolate beach, which suddenly became alive with refugees. We had to wait until the last rubber boarding-raft was being loaded. Then we were allowed to light one brief flare, to catch the scene.

In the tension and confusion, on the tiny craft, part of our equipment got dumped into the sea; this included our developing kit, used on the ends of each reel, to see if we were getting anything at all, in the minimum light under which we usually shot. So we went aboard our little freighter, and filmed in the dark holds, on a prayer.

After 11 days at sea, as we neared Palestine, a Haganah lad (later killed in Israel's War of Independence) took our footage from us, and hid it somewhere below. Nine chances out of ten, we would be captured. Then, our boat would be left in the "derelict row" in Haifa harbor. A cleaning crew would be sent aboard. Among them would be a Haganah man who knew where to look. He'd get our film out to us.

So it happened, except for the essential material shot as the British jumped onto the ship. This footage was in the camera and on my person. The captors got it.

While the refugees were taken to Cyprus, we four filmers were jailed in Haifa—the three men in a prison in the Jewish quarter, and Tereska in an Arab jail that was considered so dangerous that all Jewish males were being evacuated from it. Fortunately, one of the men got a glimpse of a Jewish girl being brought in, and rapidly set a political rescue operation in motion.

After being jailed for a week, we were released on a deportation order. But we had a few days of liberty. During this time, we took the spine-chilling ride on the Haganah convoy to Jerusalem. The average was an ambush a day on that road.

We got through, however, without incident, perhaps because "lucky" Golda Meir, the present Foreign Minister of Israel, who made that desperate trip several times a week, was in our convoy. In Jerusalem, in my war correspondent's uniform, I asked for my film back. I was told it had to be sent to England to be developed and censored. "Most of what you have is unexposed," I said. "Why bother airmailing raw film?" To my astonishment, the officer allowed me to go into a dark closet and separate out the unexposed negative. I switched boxes, and thus carried away my precious final scenes, showing the capture of the ship, the unforgettable faces of the survivors.

When "The Illegals" appeared on Broadway, the reviews were magnificent. "Packs a terrific wallop, certain to endure," said VARIETY, "as a summation of this era's hopes and agonies."

But business was not so magnificent. Doubtless an art theatre would have been better, but the art theatre fad was still a-borning. The distributor put the film in a warehouse. Years later, hunting for it, I ran into my cloak-and-dagger lawyer on 55th street, quite by accident. "Say," he said, "our organization has gone out of existence and there is nobody to pay the warehouse bill on your film. I'm afraid we'll have to destroy it."

So I got it back, and remade it. But the ill-luck of "The Illegals" held firm. I had hoped that a showing at the Venice Biennale would give the film a new start. Alas, the Israel ministry forgot to write a formal letter, and the film wasn't entered. However, an unofficial press showing was arranged. An overflow crowd appeared. "The Illegals" came onto the screen—with the reels in reverse order!

Yet, television and film releases were bespoken for France, Belgium, Holland, and several other countries. A big premiere, thirteen years late, in Jerusalem. An art theatre showing in New York.

I suppose even bad luck can't kill the real thing. As for me, once I've published a book, I can't look at it again, but with "The Illegals," I've seen the film over a thousand times, and I'm always enthralled, not because of anything I might have given to this material, but because no one could have failed, one only had to get those faces onto film.

Berlin Nite Life

on an island makes more one concentrate on the dwelling.

The second fact: The old places still rule the scene. The Resi, the home of the original Dancing Waters, has remained the No. 1 goal for visitors from abroad and W-Germany. Although located in a workmen's district and quite some way off the Kurfuerstendamm, city's Broadway, it's sort of amazing to see how this enterprise manages to maintain its dominating position. It has, of course, its surefire attractions. Apart from the Dancing Waters, it still has its famous mail service: Every table is equipped with a telephone and a pneumatic tube for everyone's use. (This service is controlled in the nervecentre in the cellar where also strict censorship is executed to prevent abuse of this means of communication.) And of course the Resi is an ideal old "once - in - Berlin - once-to-the-Resi" slogan still goes.

Other Click Spots

The Old-Fashioned still proves a click. Located on Kurfuerstendamm, its clientele appreciates the pleasant intimate atmosphere. A lot of local showfolk favor Old-Fashioned as a favorite hangout. Black Bottom and Club 13 are relatively new in popularity. The latter located on and the former near the Kurfuerstendamm, and it has a more intimate atmosphere too. This may reveal a current local trend: smaller and/or more intimate places are higher in demand. The Resi's 1,800 seats, of course, is the exception.

Lineup of the more successful local places must include the Hilton (often the site of big events such as the film ball, lavish film parties, etc.) and in particular its beautiful Beverly Hills-style roof-garden. It's the fave dancing spots; always good bands here.

Beatnik niteries are also much in vogue. Probably most frequented by foreigners are Eden Saloon and Riffi. The former is noteworthy for a number of innovations such as a beer (or schnaps or whisky, etc.) cable-car; closed circuit television (one can see what's going on in the next room); and contests of various kind. Also worth mentioning perhaps is that the owner, Rolf Eden, introed a policy which allows anybody to enter without making the consumption of beverage compulsory. And no admission either. (He reckons that anyone who comes drinks eventually anyway.)

Eden Saloon as well as Riffi attract all sort of customers, ranging from the Cadillac trade to beatniks. Another is Franz Diener's (German ex-boxing champ) humble restaurant which, however, has managed to become very popular with the after-theatre crowd, especially show people. The others come to see the celebs. The Diener place achieved a reputation also not only for its pleasant atmosphere but also for being inexpensive.

All Kinds of Spots

All in all, the city offers any kind of night life, ranging from the old German ball to Parisian striptease. But the night life for which Berlin was once famous, particularly in the '20s, is not there. No comparison with what people are doing in Paris or Brussels. Berlin's night life is also behind Hamburg.

There's the Hamburg-styled Remde's St. Pauli which is not a bad place but no comparison to the real thing. Same goes for such spots as San Francisco or Chez Nous which try to treat its patrons to Parisian burlesque show—not too successful imitations, either.

The Zigeunerkeller (Gypsy Cellar) is a far cry from what it used to be. Charly's Night Club is okay by local standards but falls short of Paris too.

Jive-joints hold a place of their own. The most prominent is still the Badewanne (Bath Tub), an imitation of a Paris cave, or, as Yanks say, Berlin's Greenwich Village.

Queer joints, natural for a big city, are also around. There are some which cater to the real thing and others which are merely tourist attractions.

Not exactly a nightclub is Haus Carow, the city's No. 1 roadhouse. It offers good floorshows and has dancing plus several gimmicks (community singing, conga lines, etc.). Carow's is located 15 miles off the centre of W-Berlin. It's inconvenient to reach but has a naturally beautiful setting (located on a lake) as substitute.

Foreigners are often surprised about the many beer places in town. Berlin teems with them, they say; there's one at practically every corner. They may be told that there used to be even more in former years. Many closed within the years but, true, very many are still alive. And most of them will stay alive. Beer, after all, is the Berliner's favorite beverage.

Broadway's 'Cheese Club'

boys—and decided to become a punchline-destroyer himself.

As was said about New York, and can apply to the Broadway Cheese Club, everything is a "nine-day wonder' and the wonder is that it lasts nine days. No gag or practical joke conceived by pressagent-members was passed up, if they could get publicity. The Cheese Club was Broadway at its loosest moments. It lived, to the fullest, Eva Tanguay's "I don't care!" This was a sample of its heart and mind. Best description of this group: "It was educated beyond its intelligence"—that is, where talented, brilliant minds, would do the most childish things, so long as it would get a laugh. Demanded only was immediate results. It worked on the theory of the warning to comedians: "Wait for your laughs—but not more than an hour!" They had to come fast and furious, or "no dice."

Pioneer 'Sick' Joke

Sample of our reasoning. A venerable man of the theatre, named Crosby, was dying, with only a few hours to live. And believe it, a committee was formed, rushed to the bedside of the dying man, who was 92 and now in a coma—and in the most serious vein, the Committee conferred upon him "Life Membership in the Cheese Club."

As far as membership was concerned, and its dues, anybody could walk into the meetings or luncheons and "free load," without question. Everybody seemed to know that except a certain name bandleader of that era. So anxious was he to become a member that he made formal application. And while we were kiddingly deliberating on this unusual application, the maestro himself went into serious, further action. So anxious was he to become a member and careful to win the good will of a non-existent "Admittance Committee," he invited the whole club, its wives and sweethearts to be his guests, on a Sunday night, at his then famous cabaret-restaurant. Never was a group of "freeloaders" so on the load. A repast for kings, wine and the works. Not to mention Clayton, Jackson & Durante and a great show. Some 200 wining and dining beyond their capacity, really living the saying: "eat, drink and be carried." About midnight, playwright and playboy Arthur Caesar arose and made this statement to the benumbed, but approving crowd: "Members and friends of the Cheese Club. Our host (naming him) has made application for membership in our august body. And to make sure of his getting in, he has wined and dined us, at great expense. Well, anybody that's such a dope, we don't want as a member in our club—can we have a vote right here and now?" And in drunken chorus, he was "blackballed," with this proviso; if he withdrew his legitimate application for membership and would accept a "crasher's" card, we'd elect him. Since then the highly talented and beloved musician has gone in for better and surer associations.

Trying to remember many things is like trying to concentrate on all things at once, in a montage. Three-ringed circuses are not for the specialist in viewing. But, however, the montage of these fabulous days of the Broadway Cheese Club can be "frozen," for a better look at any one segment or incident. Especially a serio-comic event in the life of this group.

Huey Long

At one of the evening, mixed-groups functions, we had the smallest dais, seating only yours truly, Victor Moore and Leslie Howard. During the hilarity of the evening, Capt. George H. Maines approached the speakers' table and whispered to me: "I have Huey Long out in the corridor with me —do you want me to tell him to join your party?" This on the face of it looked like some gag — imagine Huey Long, then at the height of his dangerous power, wanting to "crash" this shindig. I announced this "bombshell," even if I thought it phony. On the announcement that Long was waiting in the corridor, I had never heard such a concerted "Bronx cheer" from a group—they accepting it as a gag. Just to satisfy my curiosity, I left the dais and went to the corridor. You could have knocked me cold—it was Huey Long, with a bodyguard of seven U.S. Senators, we discovered later, by his own admission. I now intended to really stage the menace, for his entrance. Again I made the announcement—and again, a more vociferous "razzberry" that must have been heard by the Louisiana dictator. At a signal, I waved for Capt. Maines to lead him in. Consternation hit like a bomb—the stunned group turned into wild applause when they saw that it was really Long. In panic, knowing that there were people gunning for Huey, Victor Moore and Leslie Howard rushed from the dais, leaving only yours truly, the toastmaster, to share the honors and maybe a bullet directed our way. The seven U.S. Senators stood alongside the wall.

I then directed my attention to Huey and said this to him: "Senator Long, I respect power and place in the political world." And my fearsome but kidding manner continued, by adding: "As you may be a target for someone who may vigorously disagree with you —and as that someone may emphasize his point with a bullet—and maybe being of poor aim, might hit an innocent bystander; do you mind if I also vamoose and leave this dais all to you?" He laughed and waved me off, and then went into a violent speech expressing his viewpoints on politics in general.

During his talk I got a call to the phone. It was Arthur Brisbane, top editor of the N.Y. Journal. Somebody tipped him off that Long was at this affair, with his bodyguard. Next day, a big editorial by Brisbane, stating how precarious and futile the life of a "dictator" really is; proving the necessity of a bodyguard, etc. The Senator must have read that and, getting my number somehow, got me on the phone and gave me the most beautiful tonguelashing, figuring I gave Brisbane the story. He finished his tirade with: "And what's more—that wasn't a bodyguard with me, but seven United States Senators!" Now we had a story. I informed Brisbane of that forgotten juicy bit, and he followed it up with another attack, but especially on the Senators, who were "traveling with the dictator." How Long reacted to this second bombardment, I never knew and will never know—for, in a few months later, this powerful Louisiana politico was struck down by an assassin's bullet.

How a bunch of Broadway muggs evolved the Cheese Club from the sacrosanct Ceshire Club, the famed Dickensonian London haunt, is one of those Mazda Lane whodunits, but thus it came to pass!

Yes, everything in New York is a "nine-day wonder"—although my memory and reactions are taking up much more time.

after an official dinner in the mansion.

Not so with the Kennedys. For one dinner, they brought in the stars of the American Shakespeare Festival at Stratford, Conn., and improvised a stage, for an after-dinner dramatization of selections from the Bard. No one could remember that Shakespeare had ever before been performed in the White House.

Mrs. Kennedy moved one dinner out of the White House to the grounds of Mount Vernon, George Washington's home, overlooking the Potomac. There, she had the full National Symphony Orchestra to play for them.

Charmed Pablo Casals

The President himself undertook the mission of bringing Pablo Casals out of self-enforced political retirement to play a White House concert, following another dinner. The great cellist had said he would never play in any capital of a government recognizing the Francisco Franco regime of Spain. But at the President's personal request, he yielded.

In the most meaningful step for the future, President Kennedy ordered full speed ahead on Washington's long proposed and long delayed National Cultural Center. He did it, despite warnings from advisers that such a "luxury" project should be deferred when world conditions were grave and warning flags of war were in evidence.

"This is a most important national responsibility," President Kennedy said of the Cultural Center in an off-the-cuff speech to the Center's board of trustees. "I can assure you that if you are willing to help, this Administration will give the Cultural Center every possible support. We face many difficulties not only in building it but also in maintaining it. But I am confident we can do it."

The President continued: "This represents a basic side of our national life. I think we should not hide it but should emphasize it. It will not only be a service to the world, but it will also be a service to our own people. Everything that happens here (Washington) has its influence across the country.

Bankrolling New Center

President Kennedy has made all the changes he has been able to make in the National Cultural Center board of trustees holding over from the Eisenhower Administration. It had been a lifeless group. The President chose Roger L. Stevens to head the trustees and retained Robert W. Dowling as chairman of the advisory committee. It is widely agreed that the President has greatly strengthened the board.

Stevens plans to get the money-raising effort for the Cultural Center off to what he anticipates will be at least a $7,000,000 start next May with a closed-circuit television spectacular tied in to 150 cities and towns. He hopes to sign up the nation's greatest artists for a 90-minute production. President Kennedy will make a brief speech on the telecast.

Stevens expects to collect additional sums from large foundations and be able to start the first phase of construction in late 1962 or early 1963. The site for the Center on the Potomac River has been donated by the Federal Government. It is sort of pie-shaped and has a spectacular view.

the story on alltime money champs, this issue.

A Jerry Lewis picture, "Cinderfella," fell to under the $3,000,000 mark for the first time. Columbia's "Two Rode Together" was disappointing at $1,600,000. UA's "Inherit the Wind" at $1,300,000 lacked the required punch.

At first glance Marlon Brando's "One-Eyed Jacks" (Par) is seemingly all right at $4,300,000. But Par has reason to cry and not for happy, for the expensively-made "Jacks" is winding up deeply in the ketchup.

All in all it's been another that kind of year; the blue chips finalists make for good reading, but as for the lemons, well, wait 'til next year.

Imagination

and difficult task than turning out shoes, automobiles or women's wear. The manufacturers of dreams on celluloid are dealing with the intangibles of human experience. People go to see movies to be entertained; they do not ask how much a picture costs to make before they are willing to enter the theatre. Too often they have been fooled by seeing millions of dollars eaten up by hordes of horses galloping across a huge screen or thousands of wild animals scurrying to safety in a jungle. However, they can be equally delighted with watching something real, emotionally moving and honest.

It is high time, therefore, that Hollywood producers realized they are no longer automatically assured of superiority because they can afford higher budgets; that they are, in fact, in dire danger of losing their eminence in the world market, if we cease to deliver what world audiences want in the way of entertainment, they will cease attending our theatres.

Margaret O'Brien: One Child Star Able To Qualify As An Adult Professional

By EDWARD ANTHONY

One winter late in the '30s my wife and I spent a vacation at The Whitehall in Palm Beach.

One of the entertainers at the hotel was a graceful and beautiful young dancer, billed simply as "Marissa." She did a solo act embracing a variety of numbers, using the hula as a finish . . . Marissa, wherever you are, I want to tell you, at the risk of slowing up these introductory paragraphs, that when Esther and I visited the Hawaiian Islands some years later, we found ourselves judging the hula dancers we saw there by their closeness to your own exquisitely sensitive rendition.

We became acquainted with Marissa and found her as charming offstage as on. One day in front of the hotel she asked us to meet her sister, Mrs. O'Brien, an affable and personable young woman who was wheeling an infant in a babybuggy.

When we left Florida Esther kept in touch with Marissa but we saw very little of her as she lived in Hollywood and we in the east. Some years later she and her attractive husband—she had married and was now Mrs. John Bogue—visited us in New York. We had fun reminiscing about her act at the Whitehall and the tiny infant in the babycarriage who was now America's best-known movie star, a little enchantress whose wide-eyed naturalness captivated audiences everywhere. The name Margaret O'Brien had taken on magic. And this fetching wisp of a girl was now one of the nation's biggest boxoffice draws.

About a year later business took me to Los Angeles and I asked Esther to accompany me. More observant than I, she spotted Marissa and John at the far end of the Hollywood restaurant where we were dining, and the four of us had a pleasant visit.

Margaret O'Brien was then about eight and a half, and one of the biggest names in the movie world. As publisher of the Woman's Home Companion I felt I ought to make an effort to get Margaret into the magazine in some novel way. She was a newsstand draw and it was hard to think of an angle that had not been exploited. It occurred to me that now that Margaret was nearing the advanced age of nine she ought to be thinking about writing her memoirs.

I joked about this with Marissa. Would she give the idea her blessing? She liked it and said she would gladly recommend it to Margaret's mother.

The Companion's editor, Bill Birnie, was enthusiastic about the proposed story. It was timely and would give us a chance to make an amusing claim—that we had published the shortest memoirs in history, by the youngest of the reminiscers: the autobiography of Margaret O'Brien in one article.

When Mrs. O'Brien gave her approval Birnie prepared a series of questions for her and Auntie Marissa to put to the child star.

The answers would comprise the article. Margaret wrote them out in her own vigorous round hand in a notebook.

The article was published and, if the mail from Companion readers was any criterion (not to mention the newsstand figures) it was a hit. Five years after publication we were still receiving requests for reprints of Margaret's "memoirs."

Memoirs Are Made of This

Here are some sample passages from Margaret's "autobiography," as published in 1946:

"When Mr. Mayer (Louis B. Mayer, then production head of M-G-M) asked what I wanted for Christmas I said Lassie. Mother explained to me though that Lassie did not belong to Mr. Mayer. She only works for him. She belongs to an animal trainer . . .

"I love to travel. I love Washington. We visited Lincoln's room in the White House . . . I was nervous when we went to see the President. He wasn't there though, he was away. Mrs. Roosevelt was nice to us. President Truman was there too. He wasn't President then but he was so nice to us . . . Senator Chavez took us to the Senate and we watched them make laws.

"The naughtiest thing I ever did was play massacre and scalp all my dolls . . . I got a spanking for it . . .

"I learned to ride in 'Canterville Ghost.' Charles Laughton used to come in to my dressing room in his ghost costume and read me fairy-tales.

"I played a little Irish girl in 'Three Wise Fools' and talked with a brogue just like my grandmother did . . .

"I became very good friends with Lionel Barrymore. He pretends to be so cross and serious but he really is a very nice man. He gave me a pin of pearls and saphires. It belonged to his grandmother Drew. She was an actress too. He gave me a wristwatch for Christmas, a real gold one."

Not long before the Companion article was published I met Margaret at a party given by her mother and her Auntie Marissa (by arrangement with Si Seadler of M-G-M). This was the first time I had seen Margaret in person since I had looked at her that day she was being wheeled by her mother in a babycarriage in Palm Beach and I can vouch that she was every bit as charming in the flesh as she was on the screen.

It was not one of those very big parties—I doubt whether there were more than 20 people present in all—and Margaret, in an effort to be useful, was bouncing around asking the guests if there was anything she could get for them. At one point, noticing that most of them were in huddles and neglecting the cocktail tidbits, she picked up an hors d'oeuvres tray that seemed to weigh half as much as she did and started passing it around. When I tried to relieve her of it, she said she loved doing it herself. I told her I would lighten her burden by gorging myself, which I then pretended to do in a rather crude bit of pantomime. With a charitable laugh she was off on her rounds.

When she returned we selected a couple of chairs, sat down and started talking. The observant Margaret noticed that everyone was standing except us and wondered why nobody sat down. For years I had seen people, tired at the end of a day's work, stand endlessly at cocktail parties. I had done the same thing many times. It was amusing to see this bright little girl, who seemed alert to everything, spot an example of human contradictoriness.

Not so with the Kennedys. For one dinner, they brought in the stars of the American Shakespeare Festival at Stratford, Conn., and improvised a stage, for an after-dinner dramatization of selections from the Bard. No one could remember that Shakespeare had ever before been performed in the White House.

Mrs. Kennedy moved one dinner out of the White House to the grounds of Mount Vernon, George Washington's home, overlooking the Potomac. There, she had the full National Symphony Orchestra to play for them.

Charmed Pablo Casals

The President himself undertook the mission of bringing Pablo Casals out of self-enforced political retirement to play a White House concert, following another dinner. The great cellist had said he would never play in any capital of a government recognizing the Francisco Franco regime of Spain. But at the President's personal request, he yielded.

In the most meaningful step for the future, President Kennedy ordered full speed ahead on Washington's long proposed and long delayed National Cultural Center. He did it, despite warnings from advisers that such a "luxury" project should be deferred when world conditions were grave and warning flags of war were in evidence.

"This is a most important national responsibility," President Kennedy said of the Cultural Center in an off-the-cuff speech to the Center's board of trustees. "I can assure you that if you are willing to help, this Administration will give the Cultural Center every possible support. We face . . . many difficulties not only in building it but also in maintaining it. But I am confident we can do it."

The President continued: "This represents a basic side of our national life. I think we should not hide it but should emphasize it. It will not only be a service to the world, but it will also be a service to our own people. Everything that happens here (Washington) has its influence across the country.

Bankrolling New Center

President Kennedy has made all the changes he has been able to make in the National Cultural Center board of trustees holding over from the Eisenhower Administration. It had been a lifeless group. The President chose Roger L. Stevens to head the trustees and retained Robert W. Dowling as chairman of the advisory committee. It is widely agreed that the President has greatly strengthened the board.

Stevens plans to get the money-raising effort for the Cultural Center off to what he anticipates will be at least a $7,000,000 start next May with a closed-circuit television spectacular tied in to 150 cities and towns. He hopes to sign up the nation's greatest artists for a 90-minute production. President Kennedy will make a brief speech on the telecast.

Stevens expects to collect additional sums from large foundations and be able to start the first phase of construction in late 1962 or early 1963. The site for the Center on the Potomac River has been donated by the Federal Government. It is sort of pie-shaped and has a spectacular view.

the story on alltime money champs, this issue.

A Jerry Lewis picture, "Cinderfella," fell to under the $3,000,000 mark for the first time. Columbia's "Two Rode Together" was disappointing at $1,600,000. UA's "Inherit the Wind" at $1,300,000 lacked the required punch.

At first glance Marlon Brando's "One-Eyed Jacks" (Par) is seemingly all right at $4,300,000. But Par has reason to cry and not for happy, for the expensively-made "Jacks" is winding up deeply in the ketchup.

All in all it's been another that kind of year; the blue chips finalists make for good reading, but as for the lemons, well, wait 'til next year.

Imagination

and difficult task than turning out shoes, automobiles or women's wear. The manufacturers of dreams on celluloid are dealing with the intangibles of human experience. People go to see movies to be entertained; they do not ask how much a picture costs to make before they are willing to enter the theatre. Too often they have been fooled by seeing millions of dollars eaten up by hordes of horses galloping across a huge screen or thousands of wild animals scurrying to safety in a jungle. However, they can be equally delighted with watching something real, emotionally moving and honest.

It is high time, therefore, that Hollywood producers realized they are no longer automatically assured of superiority because they can afford higher budgets; that they are, in fact, in dire danger of losing their eminence in the world market. If we cease to deliver what world audiences want in the way of entertainment, they will cease attending our theatres.

Margaret O'Brien: One Child Star Able To Qualify As An Adult Professional

By EDWARD ANTHONY

One winter late in the '30s my wife and I spent a vacation at The Whitehall in Palm Beach.

One of the entertainers at the hotel was a graceful and beautiful young dancer billed simply as "Marissa." She did a solo act embracing a variety of numbers, using the hula as a finish . . . Marissa, wherever you are, I want to tell you, at the risk of slowing up these introductory paragraphs, that when Esther and I visited the Hawaiian Islands some years later, we found ourselves judging the hula dancers we saw there by their closeness to your own exquisitely sensitive rendition . . .

We became acquainted with Marissa and found her as charming offstage as on. One day in front of the hotel she asked us to meet her sister, Mrs. O'Brien, an affable and personable young woman who was wheeling an infant in a babybuggy.

When we left Florida Esther kept in touch with Marissa but we saw very little of her as she lived in Hollywood and we in the east. Some years later she and her attractive husband—she had married and was now Mrs. John Bogue—visited us in New York. We had fun reminiscing about her act at the Whitehall and the tiny infant in the babycarriage who was now America's best-known movie star, a little enchantress whose wide-eyed naturalness captivated audiences everywhere. The name Margaret O'Brien had taken on magic. And this fetching wisp of a girl was now one of the nation's biggest boxoffice draws.

About a year later business took me to Los Angeles and I asked Esther to accompany me. More observant than I, she spotted Marissa and John at the far end of the Hollywood restaurant where we were dining, and the four of us had a pleasant visit.

Margaret O'Brien was then about eight and a half, and one of the biggest names in the movie world. As publisher of the Woman's Home Companion I felt I ought to make an effort to get Margaret into the magazine in some novel way. She was a newsstand draw and it was hard to think of an angle that had not been exploited. It occurred to me that now that Margaret was nearing the advanced age of nine she ought to be thinking about writing her memoirs.

I joked about this with Marissa. Would she give the idea her blessing? She liked it and said she would gladly recommend it to Margaret's mother.

The Companion's editor, Bill Birnie, was enthusiastic about the proposed story. It was timely and would give us a chance to make an amusing claim—that we had published the shortest memoirs in history, by the youngest of the reminiscers: the autobiography of Margaret O'Brien in one article.

When Mrs. O'Brien gave her approval Birnie prepared a series of questions for her and Auntie Marissa to put to the child star.

The answers would comprise the article. Margaret wrote them out in her own vigorous round hand in a notebook.

The article was published and, if the mail from Companion readers was any criterion (not to mention the newsstand figures) it was a hit. Five years after publication we were still receiving requests for reprints of Margaret's "memoirs."

Memoirs Are Made of This

Here are some sample passages from Margaret's "autobiography," as published in 1946:

"When Mr. Mayer (Louis B. Mayer, then production head of M-G-M) asked what I wanted for Christmas I said Lassie. Mother explained to me though that Lassie did not belong to Mr. Mayer. She only works for him. She belongs to an animal trainer . . .

"I love to travel. I love Washington. We visited Lincoln's room in the White House . . . I was nervous when we went to see the President. He wasn't there though; he was away. Mrs. Roosevelt was nice to us. President Truman was there too. He wasn't President then but he was so nice to us . . . Senator Chavez took us to the Senate and we watched them make laws.

"The naughtiest thing I ever did was play massacre and scalp all my dolls . . . I got a spanking for it . . .

"I learned to ride in 'Canterville Ghost.' Charles Laughton used to come in to my dressing room in his ghost costume and read me fairy-tales.

"I played a little Irish girl in 'Three Wise Fools' and talked with a brogue just like my grandmother did . . .

"I became very good friends with Lionel Barrymore. He pretends to be so cross and serious but he really is a very nice man. He gave me a pin of pearls and saphires. It belonged to his grandmother Drew. She was an actress too. He gave me a wristwatch for Christmas, a real gold one."

Not long before the Companion article was published I met Margaret at a party given by her mother and her Auntie Marissa (by arrangement with Si Seadler of M-G-M). This was the first time I had seen Margaret in person since I had looked at her that day she was being wheeled by her mother in a babycarriage in Palm Beach and I can vouch that she was every bit as charming in the flesh as she was on the screen.

It was not one of those very big parties—I doubt whether there were more than 20 people present in all—and Margaret, in an effort to be useful, was bouncing around asking the guests if there was anything she could get for them. At one point, noticing that most of them were in huddles and neglecting the cocktail tidbits, she picked up an hors d'oeuvres tray that seemed to weigh half as much as she did and started passing it around. When I tried to relieve her of it, she said she loved doing it herself. I told her I would lighten her burden by gorging myself, which I then pretended to do in a rather crude bit of pantomime. With a charitable laugh she was off on her rounds.

When she returned we selected a couple of chairs, sat down and started talking. The observant Margaret noticed that everyone was standing except us and wondered why nobody sat down. For years I had seen people, tired at the end of a day's work, stand endlessly at cocktail parties. I had done the same thing many times. It was amusing to see this bright little girl, who seemed alert to everything, spot an example of human contradictoriness.

MIFED

international film, TV film and documentary market

a new outstanding success of the Milan Trade Fair

The International Film, TVfilm and Documentary Market (MIFED) was launched to coincide with the opening of the thirty-eighth Milan Trade Fair in April 1960, and its success was such as to encourage its continuance.

While the initiative in originating it came from the Fair Organization itself, MIFED has since become a separate and independent body under its own management and subject to its own needs. Its programme is not therefore determined by the Fair authorities but by the seasonal requirements of the film industry.

Ten projection studios, numerous discussion rooms, a multilingual secretariat and international telephone exchange, telex installations and the latest technical equipment provide this organization with the best possible means to promote contacts and business transactions in the world of cinema and film production.

During 1961 two Cine-Meetings have been held at the instigation of MIFED. One of these, convened to run concurrently with the Fair, actually closed on 28 April last, one day after the end of the main event; the other ran from 9 to 21 October. In all, in 1961, 1491 full length subject films and long and short documentaries were shown.

The number of entries submitted by film producers and distributors for the two 1961 Cine-Meetings was higher than those received for the two previous ones. Of particular note has been the interest displayed in MIFED by Asian countries such as Japan, India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Hong Kong and the Philippines whose representatives were among the most outstanding in their field.

MIFED's fifth Cine-Meeting, which will take place this Spring from 12 to 28 April, has already attracted wide interest throughout the Cinema industry.

THE ENEMY*

Within the United States many segments of Americans have created and nurtured a weapon — the only weapon — that someday may destroy us all.

It is hate!

We use it against each other and the rest of the world uses it against us.

Megaton bombs in the hands of enemies will never be as deadly as the hate men bear toward each other.

We still deny food and medical help to men and women and children if their skin is a little darker than ours.

We still join clubs that exclude men and women because of their religious beliefs.

Politicians still preach of fall-out shelters to attract votes from a scared citizenry.

Let them advocate places above ground in the fresh air and in the bright sunshine for the development of friendship and understanding amongst our own people.

It may be late but there is still a way out:

It is—Love!

Philadelphia and changed its "corrupt and contented" attitude to one of rejuvenation and rededication. A new attitude developed among its citizenry.

The national press, radio and tv recognized the new Philadelphia and draped it with bouquets and plaques. But its past (among comedians) lurked in the shadows, never quite dead but dormant for a short period. Apparently the new crop of comedy writers ran out of material and began "researching." Out of the maze of history came the old gags about Philadelphia:

Dorothy Parker's "cemetery with lights" description of Philadelphia;

Its water is unfit to drink (chlorine cocktails, Schuylkill punch); bring your own distilled water; thick enough to chew;

First prize, one week in Philadelphia; second prize, two weeks.

W. C. Fields' epitaph for a tombstone: I'd rather be here than in Philadelphia.

The "campaign" to fight these ancient gags was not carried out because of lack of humor. It was felt that too much had gone into changing Philadelphia's image to allow the millions who watch tv to fall for the old gags.

Fight Goes On

Philadelphia's drive for tourism was at stake. So the fight was on.

The Saturday Review repeated the old Dorothy Parker gag and brought in W. C. Fields' alleged declaration.

These were refuted with the facts. A Time Magazine article of May 28, 1956, stated:

"Moved one day by intimations of mortality, that bibulous philosopher, W. C. Fields, looked back on his arid boyhood home and chose his modest alternative to death: 'On the whole, I'd rather be in Philadelphia.'"

W. C. Fields had been misquoted from the beginning!

Jack Carter pulled one of the old bromides on the Perry Como show. The late Manie Sacks, a native Philadelphian who loved his city, was then an NBC executive. He was appealed upon to intercede.

Later, Carter pulled the same gag on the Sullivan show. More protests, this time to Sullivan suggesting that Carter was "overpaid" for using old material on his show.

Carter "crumbled." He advertised in VARIETY and the Philadelphia press:

"What can I say after I say I'm sorry." Apologies accepted under the terms that a truce means no old jokes about Philly.

Shortly thereafter, Milton Berle had one on his show, a snide reference to Princess Grace's appendectomy and Sunday "openings." Another protest brought a line from Berle:

"Some of my best friends are from Philly. I thought so long as you said something, it was publicity and helped. But I'll not do it again."

Last winter at the Latin Casino, Berle didn't remember the incident, claimed he "never" said anything detrimental about "lovely" Philadelphia but signed a pledge "I will never repeat any old gags about Philadelphia." Signed: Milton (under protest!) Berle.

Pat Carroll once "kicked" Philadelphia but Joey Bishop, a Philadelphian filling in for Jack Paar, came to the rescue. Later, Pat played at Playhouse in the Park, was given a long tour of the city and came back on Paar's show later to apologize.

Jackie Gleason was in Philadelphia for pre-Broadway showing of "Take Me Along." Earl Wilson later printed an alleged conversation between ex-Philadelphian Toots Shor and Gleason.

Et Tu Toots?

"Tell me, Toots," asked Jack. "What can I do in Philly on Sunday?"

"What can you do in Philly any day," was Toots retort.

Gleason was sent a long list of what was available to him on Sunday, including National League baseball (not available anywhere else on the East Coast). The next day Gleason called.

"Hello, Abe, this is the Great Gleason. I just got through reading your letter. I got so tired doing all those things you outlined for me I had to go back to bed!"

The "toughest" to conquer was Jack Paar. He has refused to reply to protests by letter, refuses to provide "equal time" but apparently gave in through a conversation on the air with Rev. Billy Graham.

During the interview, Graham noted that he was appearing in Philadelphia, and then showered compliments on the city.

"Warm, receptive, really dramatic story of comeback of a city. Great people who are really doing things," said Graham.

"I always liked Philadelphia," said Paar. "The only thing is I don't like to be threatened."

We have since written Paar to point out that ours were not threats, just the facts! To offset the negative, we have developed a positive program:

1. Enlisted such Philadelphians as Bishop, Mickey Shaughnessy, Ed Wynn to help promote the city as "Ambassadors of Mirth."

2. Whenever show people come to Philly, they are sent a deck of pictorial playing cards with Philadelphia scenes and a letter:

"We know you may not have much time to see our city now. We hope the playing cards give you a good picture of our city. These cards may not bring you luck but it'll give you a bird's eye view of our city. Come again soon!"

Hawaiian Clashes

long run if every interview-worthy arrival got so splattered by the press.

A few weeks later, Mickey Rooney also soured when a newspaper account noted that he had checked into an expensive hotel suite — expensive by reporters' salary standards, at least — and How Come if he's virtually penniless, etc. etc. Rooney consequently expressed resentment of what he considered tasteless reporting, if not necessarily invasion of privacy.

While these are exceptions rather than common place, they've been occurring often enough to suggest some ground rules that can assure peaceful, generally pleasant, relations between stars and Hawaii newsmen.

First of all, if a star is arriving for professional appearance, the more publicity the better. The local impressario or go-between has interviews firmed up in advance. And maybe a couple of space-grabbing stunts, such as arriving at a radio station via helicopter for a spot interview. Maybe an unspiked-cola "press conference" for high school journalists. They're opinion-molders, too.)

For the working press, formal press conferences are stilted, boring and generally a waste of time. Separate interviews with the assigned writers involve more time, but the results are worth it.

Nelsons' Know-How

The Nelson Family — you've heard of them—were introduced to the communications crowd at a genuinely pleasing reception and cocktail party. Ozzie and Harriet, heaven knows, had nothing to gain personally except short-time friendships. Nonetheless, they made like the hospitable host and hostess they are.

If it's any consolation, the papers (four, counting two Japanese-English language dailies) send reporters offport or to the airport only for stars they deem newsworthy. An off-the-cuff "say it in a few minutes" interview serves the purpose if the reporters are hep enough (they are) to ask a couple of pertinent questions and IF the celeb has dreamed up a few quips or comments before he Meets the Press.

Alas, this repartee still persists:

Reporter: "How do you like Hawaii"

Star: "Why this is the first time I've ever been here."

Reporter: "Well, then, when are you leaving?"

Should one or more of the papers try to reach you at the hotel for a subsequent intelligent interview-in-depth, mutual cooperation will result in a readable, accurate public-influencing article.

It's that simple.

Television Networks In Urgent Need Of A 'Design for Living Together'

A Vast Minowland

By CHARLES ISAACS

Hollywood

Back in 1961 no one really thought that Mr. Minow's attack on television would have any lasting impact. But in 1962, when all the private eye, gangster and western shows went off the air, the industry began to topple. The shows weren't cancelled outright; the violence was simply removed, and people stopped watching. Product sales sagged. Without violence, people didn't feel really clean, nor did they have any desire to brush after every meal.

Charles Isaacs

In 1963, fresh from this victory, Mr. Minow attacked situation comedies as teaching the mass audience that father was a jerk. Father was always wrong—even if he was funny being wrong, he was still a jerk. Psychologists insisted that such programs were causing disobedience to parents and increasing delinquecy. Juvenile gang members, when arrested, also excused their behavior with, "My old man is a jerk. All of our fathers are jerks, just like Robert Young, Danny Thomas, Ozzie Nelson, Andy Griffith, Dick Van Dyke and Donna Reed." (They explained that if they had to have a jerk for a father they would just as soon it be Donna Reed.)

Parents and teachers, many of whom were jerks, rose up in wrath. Spurred on by Minow, they threatened boycott of products unless these poor examples of parenthood were removed. "The Danny Thomas Show," with great ingenuity, had Danny divorce his wife, and since she got the kids, he was no longer really a parent. This took the heat off him but left him doing a single. Since he owned "The Dick Van Dyke Show," he moved ruthlessly but cleverly. He had Dick divorce his wife and let her take the children. Then began the one hour "Danny & Dick Show." This was a wonderful program, and Mr. Minow himself admitted that though Danny and Dick still came off like a couple of buffoons, at least they were no longer parents. Danny also owned the "Andy Griffith Show," which was still in trouble with Andy being a father. Danny had Jack Elinson and Chuck Stewart write a beautiful and warm script about how Andy's son actually turned out to be his foster-son, and the rightful parents came and took him to their big home in Scarsdale. Andy now joined Danny and Dick in an hour and a half a week called, "The Danny, Dick & Andy Show."

Ozzie & Harriet didn't have too much of a problem. They simply admitted in a tearful confession that Ricky wasn't their son. In real life he was Frankie Avalon, and their other boy, David, was Tab Hunter's son by Tuesday Weld. Ozzie wanted to quit anyway, because in the evenings he was really Rudy Vallee and was busy with his Broadway show.

By 1964, Minow had taken most of the waste out of the wasteland. He had also taken most of the land. He threw out all giveaway and guessing games. "I've Got a Secret" was axed when Mr. Minow declared that encouraging people to divulge a secret was invasion of privacy. There were yawning spaces in prime time, and Mr. Minow tried gallantly to fill them. In the interest of education, he put "Ding Dong School" in a nighttime slot, and to get an adult audience he changed the name to "Ding Dong Daddy School." Tuesday night he slotted in an hour of symphony music called, "ing Along with Leopold Stokowski."

The critics who had blindly followed Mr. Minow became restless. There were no more parties, no food and no free booze; the producers of educational shows served tea.

The Big Bible Bust

In 1965, Mr. Minow made two serious mistakes. He put dramas from the Bible on the air and ordered the producers to follow the stories to the letter. Millions of shocked viewers saw a vivid portrayal of Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden, with Charlton Heston and Mamie Van Doren for name value. No matter how true and how religious, it was the strongest bit of sex since "Not Tonight, Henry." Mr. Minow bowed to the P.T.A. and banned the Bible.

An even greater error was Mr. Minow's idea of booking Dr. Edward Teller, who in 39 successive weeks of instructive half-hour programs actually built an atom bomb. This was educational television at its best, and Mr. Minow was elated that it proved to be especially interesting to young people. It proved to be more than interesting to Freddie Gethbart, a 14-year-old physics major at U.C.L.A. Freddie was obviously a genius and, like most child prodigies, concentrated on intellectual efforts. His only outlet had been watching television Westerns, and now, of course, these were gone. Dr. Teller began his series. While Dr. Teller built his atom bomb, Freddie, his eyes glued to the television set every week, built his bomb. Of course no one knew Freddie had the bomb until one day Mr. Minow got a phone call. Mr. Minow, called to the telephone by a puzzled aide, asked Freddie what he wanted.

Freddie said, "I want you to put Westerns back on the air."

"I'm busy," answered Mr. Minow. "Please don't call here. Write a letter."

Freddie said, "Put back the Westerns, or I'll drop my atom bomb on Washington."

Minow gasped, "You'll what?"

Freddie said, "I built an atom bomb just like Dr. Teller's. I will drop it on you if you don't put the West-

'Don't Invite ABC, CBS, NBC to the Same Industry Parties' Themes the Rancor And Hostility Which Checkmate A Cooperative Spirit Essential To Progress

By GEORGE ROSEN

An American tragedy of sorts is being enacted within the realm of the broadcasting industry, specifically among the three television networks—a tragedy because it must inevitably have its effect on the millions who look to tv for entertainment and enlightenment.

It is a tragedy that fundamentally has its roots in the behavior patterns of the men responsible for the conduct and administration of the networks. Honorable men, all within the framework of their own thinking; their application, zeal and enterprise springing from the best tradition of American get-up-and-go; each loyal to a fault. Yet it is the very nature of this zeal, this loyalty, the degree to which they cling to a "my-network-right-or-wrong" philosophy that has brought a sadness and a kind of morality that ill-behooves an industry of such giant stature, capable of generating such manifold wonders and goodwill.

Whatever the images of Babbitry they conjure up, there is something to be said for the hail-fellow-well-met spirit that permeates the luncheons of a Rotary, Kiwanis or a Civitan Club, whose memberships comprise not only leaders of the community, but rivals in business, industry and merchandise to whom competition means nothing more nor less than the incentive to build a better mousetrap without sacrificing the basic tenets of live and let live.

Yet therein lies the difference — and the tragedy. Granted that a competitive spirit is a healthy one, that it sparks a momentum and a creativity without which no enterprise could prominently flourish. Through the years of American endeavor, whatever the stock in trade, it's been the keystone for most of the success stories. But when it feeds on fierce competition alone, to an extent where the human equation no longer exists, where there's little or no feeling or regard for the "guy across the street" who happens at the moment to be doing the job a little better, it becomes quite evident that something is basically wrong and needs fixing.

Glory for All

There are plenty of dollars and plenty of glory to cover all three networks. The economics are not disturbing. What is disturbing, however, is the ill feeling and contemptuous attitude of one network toward another—a state of affairs that starts at the top and permeates though the companies the stubborn refusal to concede that someone else's better Nielsen might be fully deserved; that a rival's meritorious accomplishment might, however grudgingly, be accepted and applauded for the good of the industry as a whole, rather than held up to scorn and ridicule.

Yet is happens practically every day of the week, in one form or another. This is not something that's crept up suddenly, for the rancor and the bitterness in the three-network intramural sweepstakes is something of long standing.

In the palmiest days of Hollywood, for all the intense rivalry among the major studios, there was nonetheless a rapport among the top executives; a mutual respect and, let's face it, an admiration for another man's high achievements.

But no such feelings are evident among the networks. And the sadness lies in the fact that, in the current all-out competitive race for attention the situation becomes intensified.

It's fairly evident at this point, where television is concerned, that everything goes in cycles. For a few years CBS can be on top; then ABC hits the Nielsen jackpot; then comes NBC's turn. The order can be reversed, but inevitably they all get a whack at it. That's the pattern, and all things being equal that's how it'll go on. Yet such are the deeprooted animosities that there is a virtual contempt for the opponent on top and, in turn, an unbecoming gloating for the rival who got kicked downstairs.

Occasions arise when a unity of action is required, particularly at a time when the pressures are being applied with renewed intensity by a determined FCC. Yet on one of the few occasions when the FCC Chairman, Newton N. Minow, championed a gettogether of the three-network hierarchy to work out a solution to the problem of programming late afternoons for children, ABC took it upon itself to "take a walk" in asserting it preferred to act independently of the other two networks.

Admittedly ABC may have been acting on the premise that by "soloing" on the venture it could emerge with something more rewarding and distinctive. Yet there was no disguising the undercurrent of hostility in the three-network relations.

The Numbers Game

The Election Night numbers game brouhaha was another case in point, when ABC's news chieftain James C. Hagerty called a press conference to castigate NBC for allegedly "projecting" figures on the returns. The unprecedented action inspired, in turn, a rebuttal of "sour grapes" from NBC. Whatever the motives or whatever the misdemeanor, if any, it was unfortunate all around, certainly doing more harm to the industry as a whole than it could possibly do Hagerty good.

If anything, it merely served to pinpoint the rather obvious fact that if the same energies that are being expended in downgrading the opposition were applied constructively and as an incentive to matching or bettering the competition, television would be the healthier and the stronger for it.

There is, for example, no love lost in the competitive CBS vs. NBC News operations. There's no disputing the NBC leadership in this area today, a fact brought home with telling impact on a number of important events, including the election coverage. At the same time the departure of Howard K. Smith from CBS over policy differences emphasized anew—as did Edward R. Murrow's exiting some months previously—a perceptible downgrading of that network's once preeminent status in news.

Statesmanship

The NBC momentum continues apace, despite some attempts at CBS to heal the breach. Whatever the ingredients so necessary to put Columbia back into the running would seem still lacking, inviting bewilderment in some quarters as to why the astute Bill Paley-Frank Stanton helmship contents itself with a continuation of the status quo. In another day and age, it's recognized, Paley would have found the "magic ingredient" pronto, even if it meant the board chairman himself stepping into the breach as CBS' "Mr. News" factotum. (Even as, only a few years back, Gen. David Sarnoff personally took command of NBC by installing himself as president and thus stemming a threatened wave of affiliate defections). It would, obviously, require some such flash, dramatic play for CBS to get up the proper steam. Certainly the injecting of the "Paley touch" and showmanship flair could even yet turn the trick.

But what one hears, instead, are grudging admissions that "after all, they got Brinkley and Huntley, and that's what makes the difference," with an otherwise stubborn refusal to accept the rival web's superior attainment.

Such is the three-network "climate" today. Soon must come a realization that only by a spirit of cooperation and by addressing themselves to a competitive situation within a live-and-let-live framework can the networks fully regain public esteem and respect.

THE VELVET GLOVE

By SHERWOOD SCHWARTZ

Hollywood.

In meetings in television land, the iron fist is invariably enclosed in a velvet glove. After a little conference experience, it becomes a simple matter to predict how a sentence will end just by listening to the beginning. Here are a few samples of verbal velvet gloves. When you hear them, watch out—the Iron Fist isn't far behind!

THE SPONSOR: "Believe me, fellows, all I want is a good show. The ratings mean absolutely nothing to me, but—"

NETWORK EXECUTIVE: "We know you've got a rough time slot, so we don't expect miracles. We're going to give you at least two full years to allow the show to build, and—"

THE DIRECTOR: "I know there are lots of directors who refuse to listen to actors' opinions, but I'm not one of them. # German TV Seeking To Eliminate Prejudices—Viewers Pay Attention

By HAZEL GUILD

Frankfurt.

As the two children playing the roles of Mary and Joseph in a television show on the German TV net went from door to door in a futile search for lodging for the night, the German narrator in the background said, "These children are not like other children . . . I hope you will open your doors and hearts to them."

The 10 children who took part in the Christmas play on televson were unlike other German children, because their skins were dark. The youthful actors were "Occupation Children," abandoned by their German mothers and Negro American soldier fathers. And the narrator of the Christmas drama was their foster mother, a German social worker.

After the play was finished, the foster mother recounted several incidents in the difficult lives of these children. Eight years previously, when they first entered her home, they were taught to write, "I am now a member of a family" —words completely unfamiliar to these children who had been moved from one orphanage to another in their brief friendless lives.

The foster mother, in her parallel between the Biblical story and the tale of these forgotten children, asked the German television audience to open their hearts and their homes to these neglected children, who are among West Germany's 100,000 illegitimate children fathered by American soldiers, and of whom 14,000 are Negro.

This program was, in a way, typical of the trend of German television productions, aimed at the eradication of prejudices in this country.

Ever since the disasters and horrors of the Nazi regime, West Germany has been trying to live down its dreadful reputation, at home and abroad.

And perhaps in a land where the television industry comes under federal and state government controls, and where the accent is on documentaries, cultural, and worthwhile programming, it is easier to do these penetrating topics that it would be in a land like America, where the slant is toward entertainment, and what the advertiser thinks the public wants.

West Germany currently has about 6,000,000 television sets. And each set owner pays a monthly fee of seven marks (about $1.75) which is used to support the programming. Since there is no need for an advertising budget to underwrite the costs of the show, advertising is kept to a minimum —spot ads are permitted, lumped together for five minutes at the beginning and end of a half-hour evening show. But the advertiser or the agency never get into the television show production business. And for this reason, perhaps, the German television has the time, courage and money to tackle touchy subjects like those relating to the eradication of racial prejudices.

'Occupation Babies'

Another recent show hit at the same problem of the half-Negro children. Last April, the first of the "occupation babies" left over as souvenirs by the American GIs reached the age of 14—the age at which a German child who does not have the benefit of heading for a college education goes out to be an apprentice in industry.

Particularly trying were the times for the several thousand colored children, age 14, who were seeking work. And a probing German television show revealed the plight of some of these children, urging the German business people, industrial officials, and any folks coming into contact with the young people, to remember that they are of German nationality and should be accepted as individuals, trying to fit their life patterns into a difficult mold.

Probably the most ambitious project ever tackled by the West German television was the 14-part documentary titled "Das Dritte Reich" (The Third Reich). The West German schools have often been criticized for not teaching the young people about the atrocities of the Nazi era, about the crimes committed against the Jews, about the guilt of the German people in this black period of world history.

And following several pre-Christmas anti-Semitic incidents two years ago, the South German Television of Stuttgart and the West German Television of Cologne prepared this 700 minutes of documentary. It took the viewers from the very start of the Hitler rise in 1933, through the atrocities of the Nazis in World War II, up to the end in 1945.

'We Germans Must Realize'

The cameras focused on the graveyards where the bodies lie of the German, American, French, English, Italian and Russian troops killed in the war, and showed the rooms-full of files of the fate of the 4,500,000 Jews who were the innocent victims of the mass slaughter. And the words of the announcer cut through every heart. "We Germans must realize that we have to answer for all this."

It's pretty hard to feed an audience the type of material that makes the watcher feel ashamed and guilty, according to some theories. But just who watched the grim revelations of history as "The Third Reich" unrolled? About 10 million Germans—or one fifth of the country's population — were watching every part of this series, a poll has revealed.

Not only that, but to make sure that the young people who were often unaware of the Nazi brutalities saw this show, it was rebroadcast subsequently, early in the evening, with special appeals to urge the students to watch the show. Now it has just been announced that it will be carried once more on the second television channel, starting in January 1963.

A previous hourlong documentary brought a similar problem to light for the German television viewers. Titled "Our Jewish Co-Residents," this filmed show interviewed Jews who are now living in West Germany. It queried them as to how they had survived the Nazi mass murders, why they had returned to Germany, how they felt about living in Germany today.

The tattooed mark of a concentration camp stood out on the hand of one woman, as she revealed the disasters she had survived. Nonetheless, she said, she hoped to be accepted as an individual in the land of her birth. Another Jew who had returned from Israel left Germany after a brief stay, and moved on to Holland, feeling that the old anti-Semitism was not entirely erased.

Another Jew revealed the names of several former Nazi who are now holding influential positions in Germany. He told of his attitude, that he feels Germany is his homeland, and prefers living out his remaining years in this country. The documentary, dealing with many people with mixed feelings, cut deep at the topic of anti-Semitism, and was handled in excellent taste.

Not for Children

A recent documentary, at nine in the evening, began with a warning unusual for German television screens.— "Perhaps your children had better not view this program." Cops and robbers? Criminals? Wild west shooting? No.

The film was a documentary about the burial customs of a remote African tribe, where the body of the deceased is set up at a party attended by the friends and relatives. Grim? Of course. But at least more true-to-life than the topics tackled on television in many other lands. And the theme stressed throughout is that "these are the customs of another group of people. Our customs may seem strange and barbaric to them. We

Year of the Video Think-Piece —A Positive Trend in Chicago

By LES BROWN

Chicago.

In Chicago television, 1961 was the year of the documentary. What had started out to be a sop for Newton Minow's FCC has become realized as a programming form with vast side benefits, and consequently one which even the station managements can get excited about. It is unquestionably the most positive trend in local television in many a year.

Practically no other kind of station-produced show has been able to reflect as much prestige and assorted other intangible profit on the outlets as have their video think pieces, which bespeak a general seriousness-mindedness and an awareness of, and insight into, the affairs of world, state and community.

If the telementaries don't find sponsors or get high ratings—and most of them do not—that's apparently more than compensated for in the flattering mail haul, the recognition by the intelligentsia ("we didn't know you cared"), the awards and citations from organizations, and in the press coverage, which is generally pretty lean for other forms of local programming. The Windy City reviewing corps has been known to effuse in the adjective department over a particularly good documentary opus, and many a station operator has come to find the newspaper notices almost as rewarding to read as a good profit and loss statement.

'We Do It Better'

In 1961 the stations became significantly competitive in the area of documentaries, each trying to claim the form as its own specialty. During the summer, one general manager bought ads in the metro dailies complimenting a competing station on a prime time special it had telecast the night before. The ad went on to say, in effect, "We do such shows too," with the clear implication, "but just a little bit better."

In all, an estimated 48 tv documentaries were produced by the four commercial stations last year, representing around 27 hours of airtime in the aggregate. The total hours are more impressive against the fact that all the specials were presented in prime time and nearly all of them preempting paying programming, either local or network. It is impossible to get a figure on how much was spent on documentary production last year, but $200,000 is regarded as a modest estimate for the total output.

It is an index to the new priority status of the documentary that at least two of the stations have shown no reluctance to spend a generous buck on them. Although it has abundant international coverage from the CBS network, WBBM-TV saw fit to send its foreign editor, Carter Davidson, to West Germany for a two-part film and later Frank Reynolds to South America for another two-parter. Not to be outdone, WBKB sent the team of Ronny Born and Sam Ventura to West Germany for a three-installment series, only one of which has been aired so far; invested a bundle on the Norm Ross-David McElroy two hour special on the anti-missile defenses around Chicago; and flew in poet-statesman Archibald MacLeish for an installment in its "Home Again" portfolio.

Numerically, WBKB topped the local tv stations in telementary production with a total of 16 shows last year, or 10 hours worth, including the every third week station contribution to ABC-TV's "Expedition" series. WBBM-TV did 13 specials for seven and a half hours, counting its half hour editorials, each of which contain 23 minutes of background footage. WNBQ likewise produced 13 for six and a half total hours, and WGN-TV made five documentaries for three and a half hours.

(The mania, by the way, also hit some of the radio stations, with WIND, WBBM, WGN and WFMT among the notable audio documentary producers.)

The tv stations showed a willingness last year to take on provocative, and even daring, subects. WNBQ did a pair on the Chicago Crime Syndicate and the Black Muslim movement. WBBM-TV recently covered the social problem of the southern white "migrants," WBKB surveyed the advances in sleep, heart and cancer research in separate shows, and WGN-TV did one on juvenile crime.

The One That Never Got On

A curiosity of the past year is that the documentary that reverberated loudest of all locally—both in the press and in conversation circles—was one that has never been televised in the Windy City. That was Denis Mitchell's "Chicago" film, co-produced by British Broadcasting Corp. and Chi station WBKB. Rumors from abroad, after the BBC showing, that it presented a distorted and unflattering portrait of Chicago caused the film to be lacerated, sight unseen, by certain papers and civic leaders. WBKB soberly put it on the shelf but probably will air it next year if the climate seems improved. It's understood that the station has an investment of around $30,000 in the film.

As local television's best feet, the documentary will be put forward even more prominently in 1962. WBKB is projecting an Alex Dreier special on the smut peddlers, a followup to its "Inside Argonne" telementary of 1960, two additional installments of "The Face of Modern Germany," a series with Dr. Walter Alvarez on modern medicine, and other chapters in the "Home Again" series, just for a starter. Station also has a top secret telementary project which it refers to now as "Project J."

WGN has a special on improvisational theatre in the works and has blueprinted documentaries on hospitals in Chicago, on the city's contributions to music and on the history of the city up to its 125th anniversary. WNBQ is committed to at least one documentary per month at 6:30 p.m. Monday nights, and WBBM-TV is pledged to at least four editorials and quarterly "I See Chicago" outings, in addition to any telementary brainstorms that occur in between.

If You Haven't Got The Rating, You Haven't Got The Time... If You Haven't Got The Time, You Haven't Got The Rating

The Year TV Took the Fifth

By CARROLL CARROLL

To millions of people in all parts of the world, 1961 was "The Year of The Horse."

To thousands of people in the television industry, it was "The Year of The Minow."

As anyone can tell you, a minnow is bait.

As everyone knows, 1961 was the year almost everybody found some fishy reason to bait television. This didn't give 1961 much distinction over any other year. Television has been under constant attack ever since radio's fairy godmother waved her magic iconoscope and turned a sound effect into a picture, thus depriving millions of people of their last remaining chance to use their imagination for fun.

But it was in 1961 that television began to feel the force of Newton's Law.

Newton's Law, of course, concerns gravity.

And so, in 1961, Mr. Newton Minow bailed television for its lack of gravity.

Under the force of this attack a lot of people who work in, and guide the destinies of, television promptly took The Fifth. Many took a quart.

Readers who may once have been children possibly remember a rollicking pastime called "pile-on." The rules were simple. When somebody was down, you piled on.

Patsy for the 'Pile-on'

So in 1961 television became the patsy for a national game of pile-on.

The game attracted an amazingly varied and interesting group of players. These, and their positions in the game, follow:

1. Eggheads. This group seemed to feel that it was okay for them to read as many detective stories and westerns as they chose to for relaxation but that, somehow, it was dangerous for the "peepul" to relax to that extent.
2. Politicians. This group understood that television involves stars and that stars get headlines. Q.E.D., television gets headlines.
3. Liberals. This bunch argued, interestingly, that the air belongs to all the people and, therefore, should concentrate exclusively on the burning problems of the moment instead of seeking to offer what seemed most wanted by a clear majority of the people to whom the air belongs.
4. Historians. One of them suggested that Madison Ave., the going symbol of tv, drains our national resources from the fountainheads of good-doing and pours our substance into the sewers of trade, forgetting that the fountainheads would soon dry-up if the so-called sewers failed to flush them.
5. Educators. This group held that the full force of television was being dissipated on the winds of entertainment. They felt that the very high as well as the ultra high, frequencies should be sustained exclusively on a steady diet of stimulating cereals for the cerebellum.
6. Critics. This undisciplined gang maintained that because much television entertainment is of a very low character it is fair to attack all of it with very low blows.
7. The People. They were ready to damn television at the first stroke of a poll-taker's pencil, watched it night after night and bought—with demonstrable regularity and ever increasing volume—the good products offered to them in the commercials which they vowed they never watched or listened to.

A Puzzlement

As the King of Siam is said to have said, "'Tis a puzzlement."

The real puzzle is how television, clutched, as many claim, in the knotty hands of villains, fools and hucksters, continues to offer much that is so good.

That there is so much good stuff on tv is a miracle. That it is seen by so few is a pity. That there is not enough brain power in the world to properly service American television is a fact.

There are three networks on the air seven days a week, 18 hours a day. That adds up to 378 hours of programming a week.

There are four independent channels in New York and four in Los Angeles. Each of these eight is on the air for the same 18 hours a day, seven days a week. This works out to 1,008 more hours of competitive programming a week for a total of 1,386 hours of television programming, counting only the three networks, New York and Los Angeles. There's no need to play the numbers game any further. This amount of programming demands more brains than there are.

There has always been an ugly shortage of genius in the writing department of tv. Now, plain, ordinary competence has its back to the wall. What need is there for solid professional knowhow? Any nag can enter the field because there are so few thoroughbreds. And any exercise boy can be a jockey. Yet it is literally astounding that, with all its repetitiousness and all its meretriciousness, television manages to entertain and instruct so many people, delight so many children and give them, as well as their parents, a window through which to look upon a world most of them might never otherwise see.

To a much higher degree than television's detractors will admit, everybody can find what he wants on tv if he really looks for it. The trouble seems to be that people get what they want in direct proportion to the number of them that want it. This bugs the yolks out of the eggheads who honestly think they are entitled to a larger share of what they like, even though they may get it at the expense of equally deserving if, perhaps, not such intellectual people. These eggheads have a sort of reverse Marie Antoinette attitude. They want to take away the majority's cake and let them eat bread.

The air, the complainers say, is free. It belongs to the

By NORMAN JEWISON

A distant cousin to the numbers racket, once one of the most evil scourges targeted by law enforcement officials, is running rampant again. This time the victims are the millions of television viewers throughout the country, and the "evildoer" we're referring to is the rating, with his comical sidekick the time-slot.

For in today's video picture, it's a sad, yet everyday axiom, that if you haven't got the rating, you haven't got the time, and conversely, if you haven't got the time, you haven't got the rating.

This is an alignment that's rather hard to beat. You've got to get the nice fat numbers with the decimal points to get any kind of a time slot consideration in the "peak viewing hours," yet you've got to have a notch in these very same peak viewing hours to even become a contender for a healthy rating.

The ratings, as constructed today, are outmoded and non-representative. The fact that to win these "meters of public attentiveness" depends greatly on the time slot your show is seen in, rather than the quality of the program itself, compounds the felony.

There's nothing new in the continued discussion of the effectiveness of ratings. This has been gone into scores of times over the last decade by individuals, and groups far more competent than we, but we are not concerned here with discussing the rating systems, its faults and attributes.

We are, however, most distressed at the "team" of time and number rank that run together, and thus mean the difference between success and failure. A relatively poor show, with what is considered to be "class A" time in the peak viewing hours, is practically assured of a healthy rating, so it stays on the air. The sponsors want the mass audience, and to a certain extent this is most understandable, but what about the good show, that doesn't have a particularly good time slot?

It fails to get a healthy rating, and thus is either hurriedly shuffled or cancelled after only a short time on the air. This leaves us with a congestion of dull, unimaginative shows ruling the time slots. This is not reasonable, intelligent and hardly understandable. There have been shows on the air, just this past season, that have been greeted by the critics as fresh, delightful plot innovations, yet have been in "rating trouble" from the start. Such a show is the "Dick Van Dyke Show," headed by a refreshingly charming young comedian who has been supplied with believable script situations, resulting in excellent entertainment. But the show didn't get a good rating, and now it's being switched in an effort to "save it." What does it have to be saved from? It certainly is in good taste. Its funny. . . Everyone who sees it likes it . . . so where and what is the trouble? The official word has it that the "time-slot is wrong."

Well why don't the networks replace a bad show with a good rating, with a really good show and get an even better rating?

Unfortunately, the sponsor involved won't give up a highly rated poor show and the fine shows are dropped because they haven't been lucky enough to get a good time-slot.

Video programming can improve if it caters to the selective viewer, the one who wants a representative grouping of programs on his tv screen. Why must we have a plethora of westerns one year, detective shows the next, and so on? There should be a versatility of shows, whether it be variety, western, private eye or animated cartoon. There shouldn't be a sudden rash of copyists of one successful formula, for all they do is cancel their own efforts in the long run.

It is most unfortunate that the sponsors won't put the quality of the programs above the level of the ratings. Every sponsor wants to be in the top ten, their interest is in the size of the audience upon occasion? What they fail to realize is that a minority in television is a vast majority in other fields. Shows aimed at a selective minority carry with them not only a greater appreciation of the program, but a vastly more effective result for the sponsor's message.

We are not declaiming that all of television should become a platform for artistic expression and hang the commercial aspects. We realize the need for sponsorship under the present system of programming. But we also note that audiences are becoming more selective, that their tastes have changed and are becoming attuned to the obvious patterns of tv show scheduling.

Take Sunday afternoons, for example. No one wants to buy time on Sunday afternoon. The public service, educational and "think" programs that are on view are pure "conscience money," as far as the networks are concerned. They can point to these shows and say, "Look at us, aren't we wonderful: look at the hours of worthwhile shows we carry." Why don't they put on these shows in prime time? Because "formula" programs, the ones that fall into "this year's acceptance pattern," win these slots, while the worthwhile programs are seen on Sunday afternoons, the "cerebral oasis" of video. The agencies claim that no one wants to paint a picture, no one's going to look at, and no one wants to write a book that no one will read. So we turn to the mimeograph-like machines of success formulas, stick them in class "A" time, rack up the ratings and relegate the worthwhile shows to secondary viewing hours, or knock them off the air altogether.

Impossible Choice

The network actually isn't in charge of its programming. It's essentially a light socket, with the "bulb" being supplied by the advertising agency. The networks indulge in senseless competition, senseless waste of talent. It's deplorable when one of the networks announces a most worthwhile program for a specific time on one evening and another network has an equally worthwhile show on the same evening at the same time. This is totally unfair to the viewer, and in the long run even harms the sponsor, because he does not derive the maximum viewing attention he would get if he were willing to place his show on at another time, to cater to those who would watch his show and be interested in his sales message. It's the urge to "knock off the competition" and get that time-slot, that is ruining television.

There isn't enough of an audience, enough sponsors nor enough good shows to sustain three full networks, and as a result, they all suffer. We should have more cooperation between all the networks, but this is regarded as some sort of "olympia" that will never be realized.

The program directors should assert themselves, as far as their product is concerned. We wonder, would they lose their jobs if they cancelled the bad shows in the good time-slots and replaced them with worthwhile shows? We hardly think so.

Who decides whether a show is good or bad? The critic? Hardly, for the critic has no real function in television. He can't warn an audience, as they do in the theatre. Once his views are read, the show is seen and gone. More show should be previewed by critics, to put them in a reasonable position of authority and creative control. Television has lost such astute commentators of the viewing tube as John Crosby, merely because they were robbed of their true functions.

The industry should be willing to be judged by competent, intelligent critics, rather than by a rating system that takes a non-representative grouping of homes, refers to the same group, year after year, and allows this method to be the unquestioned standards by which the axe falls on months of creative thought and planning.

Content Undiscussed

The BBC, the English network, practices balanced programming. For years the English audience has been conditioned to selective listening and viewing. They don't try to completely smother the air with the shows that supposedly "everyone" is watching. "Everyone" turns out to be those who leave their sets on automatically in an area contacted by the rating system, and influenced by an erroneous concept of what is popular. There should be a vast range of programs for all tastes.

Shows should be reviewed by the critics prior to actually being seen. In this way the sponsor will exercise more care in what he chooses and the general level of shows will be raised. The sponsor should allow the creative people in television to control what makes up a program. He should merely select the time he wants and then turn it over to the experts. As long as this condition does not exist we will be victims of the destructive lack of perspective and will continue to be victimized by the juxtaposition of time and rating, rating and time.

Let's make it so that you can get the rating if you're good, not just if you appear at the right time.

Who Says Gesundheit To Who?

By SOL SAKS

Hollywood.

If you ever want to know what your status is in the t.v. business, just sneeze on a set and count the people who say "Gesundheit" (only don't sneeze while the red light is on, because all you'll get is stares. I don't care if you're Troy Donahue unless maybe you're somebody like Abe Lastfogel and even then the prop man will just write "Gesundheit" on a small slate which he keeps handy for just such emergencies.

It's the most infallible status rating system I know.

Take note the next time you hear somebody on a studio lot sneeze. Unless, of course, the sneezer is your superior and then don't waste time taking notes but let out with a hearty "Gesundheit" if you ever expect to meet your payments on the Jaguar.

For instance, if the cameraman sneezes, the assistant cameraman says "Gesundheit," if the director sneezes, everybody except the producer, the star and supporting players under firm contracts respond—except the associate producer unless he is married to the star or has the live phone numbers or is a gin rummy pigeon, in which case it is optional.

If an agent sneezes, nobody even looks.

If the star sneezes, the walls resound with "Gesundheits" and MCA telelypes one in from New York.

Unless the show has been cancelled.

Then she could sneeze her pretty little head off and her own mother wouldn't give her a Kleenex.

Are you getting the idea?

Then There's the Ad Lib Sneeze

Now if a writer sneezes, there is no precedent to follow, because what is a writer doing on the set anyway? In a case like this you have to ad lib, because when a writer sneezes it's just a demand for attention and it's better not to encourage them, but on the other hand you should play it safe, because they sometimes get to be associate producers.

Only the immediate family and close friends "Gesundheit" for a bit player.

Unless she's pretty and your wife is out of town.

If a makeup man sneezes, all actresses respond and all actors playing 10 years or more younger than their age.

There are, of course, other rating systems like whose secretary gets who to get on the phone first, or who laughs at whose jokes, or who has the most obscure foreign sports car, or who goes home earlier, or who dares to be first to order a drink at lunch.

But this one is the most efficient and comprehensive. Because after all you don't put your neck out when you sneeze (unless, of course, the red light is on and you're not Abe Lastfogel) and everybody within earshot has to stand up and be counted.

For instance, you want to know whether your option is being picked up. Just walk past the personnel office, where the secretary is probably in the midst of that interminable conversation which all secretaries are always having about the dull things they did last night, and sneeze. If she doesn't even pause, you might as well look forward to renewing old acquaintances at the Unemployment Office.

If, however, she pushes down the hold button long enough to give you a bright smile and a seductive "Gesundheit" you can put in that requisition for new pencils with impunity and now you don't have to "gezundheit" for at least 13 weeks.

France Alerted to Imminence Of 2d TV Channel But Wary Of Its Show Business Intentions

Paris.

Posters around Paris indicate new video sets that will be able to pick up that second television channel without an addition of gadgets. Present set owners are assured that the extras for getting the new channel will only cost about $30 to $50. But just when it will be around is still not quite clear.

However when commercial interests put out their necks it is felt it can not be far off. Present estimates are for early '63 with a good probability of licensing private companies for programs, alerting vidfilm packagers and makers, but keeping control under the government even if ads will be allowed.

It is felt that the national arm, Radio - diffusion - Television Francaise, just does not have the money to do it on its own but the cultural, educational aspects will be severely safe-guarded by the RTF. But RTF head Raymond Janot pointed out in a recent talk that main interests are still focused on ameliorating the present one channel nationalized setup plus keeping up with radio, with the latter still important in France.

With over 2,800,000 tv sets in operation film interests are beginning to worry and again trying for that modus vivendi with it. Filmites are against the growing plans to have the RTF make its own vidfilms. They feel a big side video production by present filmites can smooth out things between them as has happened in the U. S. and Great Britain.

However Janot is trying to get present tv programming more diversified, better, and essaying the enlisting of higher-powered talents and trying to rev up news aspects and keep radio programs high. He gave out all his video and radio plans in a long press conference not long ago. The following were his main points and promises to give video and radio viewers more for their annual license payments.

Radio Upbeat

Contrary to pessimistic predictions in the press of late, Janot insists that radio set sales are beating video. Last year 1,564,000 portable radios were sold to the 555,550 video sets, with 400,000 car radios also going in this period.

Transistor and car outlets usually go for the France I and France II stations which specialize in music, news and comedic shows. Growing FM stations are popular with the young who want the high fidelity output and 45 new FM emitters are in, or soon going into operation. France III and France IV will veer to FM to give it greater distance.

In summing up radio Janot gives the new breakdown of shows. France I will specialize in music (classic, light and jazz), and news events plus shows giving insights into news, art, and foreign aspects. Debates, variety shows and info on available live and pic entertainment, including critiques, will also be given.

France II will be regional to allow various parts of France to get on and reveal themselves. Musical shows from various spots, including dramatic offerings by decentralized legit centers will also be heard, and detective serials, song shows etc.

France III will be national in character and many programs will be done on such themes as the Franz Liszt 150th anniversary, Henrich Von Kleist's Anni, Victo Hugo, Jean-Jacques Rousseau and others. History, in political, social terms, will be aired as will be insights into dance, literature and theatre.

France IV will bank on FM and high fidelity with music favored of all types. Literary and poetry readings will be a part of it too. After his outline of radio Janot, of course, dedicated his talk primarily to video, which is the main air show biz facet in France today.

Janot states that tv programming has to be varied and improved and intimates that it cannot be done with only one station. But he is silent on the exact coming of the second web though he feels it is imminent.

To try to please as much of the public as possible he says that all types of shows are being mulled or already prepared, which will give entertainment and keep up the cultural and educational aspects due to its nationalized form.

TV is now at 55 hours per week with about 32% live and 68% either filmed, kinescoped or taped. Janot states there is now an emphasis on dramatic shows, both complete in one showing or as series, either filmed or live. Also, historical and social programs exploring various aspects of society are contemplated in series manner.

Many straight plays by state subsidized houses have been given, with boulevard comedies, plus a turning to filmed adaptations of noted short stories and books. An updated version of Balzac's "La Grande Breteche" won awards for French tv abroad, he says. Special dramatic shows for youth, taking in moppet-type programs, are also envisaged. But some months ago a kid slot turned out to be a discussion on the problems of unwed mothers.

Studies of pressing problems will also be hiked and shows on prostitution and racism were two of the most remarked and discussed programs this season. And special dramatic shows using stereophonic aspects, by ringing in radio to be placed behind viewers during the show, have been done with "The Persians" a notable hit.

A special variety show, giving key vaude and singing figures a whole show every month, has also gone well and more variety turns are being envisaged. Dance, opera, interviews, more vidfilms, quiz shows and vaude entries are also now in action.

Regular film showings, now about 10 per month, will be more severely selected. There will be series devoted to noted directors and their films. Yank companies mainly involved are UA, 20th-Fox and Columbia. Yank packagers, as well as locals who dub U. S. vidseries for use here, have also increased.

News reports have been changed with newscasters now shown standing instead of seated. Some are against it because it is uncomfortable and also means a lapel mike with a cord hidden in the clothing. But the fact that it is government controlled does not always allow complete freedom in news, though it is felt it has improved of late.

Janot points to more 15-minute dramatic series in the afternoons with each evening, key viewing time, having at least three different-type programs. He opines that when the second chain comes along neither will have the same type of show on at the same time so as to avoid that sort of competition.

Janot says that of course direct sporting events will be important as well as on the spot news, etc. Coproductions with other countries are contemplated for diversity and more series and even feature productions by the RTF itself as well as with film companies.

So Janot is bullish. But a VARIETY conducted sampling of viewer opinion displays some impatience with the production aspects of the programs and their general quality levels. More diversity is wanted and it is felt that private means, with the ability to get top talents, could bring this on. So, though things are burgeoning on the present channel, with good and bad points, what is wanted is a more hep show biz aspect that the second web, if it is partially licensed to private interests, could give it.

Honolulu.

Honolulu, which had only two radio stations until after World War II, now has 14 AM outlets. KHAI, the newest entry, is owned by Mr. and Mrs. Robert Sherman, of San Francisco. The 5,000-watter, at 1090 kilocycles, is headquartered in the Royal Hawaiian hotel.

Moxie Whitney, orchestra leader at the Royal Hawaiian, is one of the station's initial voicers. Format is along classical and semi-classical lines.

The Four Freedoms of BBC

By KENNETH ADAM
(Director of Television Broadcasting, BBC)

London.

Thirty-five years ago last Nov. I stood in an upstairs room at the top of a block of offices in the English Midlands town of Nottingham. This was a broadcasting studio, the first in my home town, and a source of wonder and pride. It was hung with several tons of curtains, and the microphone was slung in a great lumbering trolley-cum-cage. When you spoke it was as though you were on a mountain top. Your voice was thin and rarefied. I was a schoolboy, called upon to play the hero in a verse drama of "Aucassin and Nicolette." Opposite me played the wife of the local mathematics professor. She was fair, fat and 40, and I was deeply in love with her. When I got home my father said: "Hmm, all very nice but don't go and get it in your head that there is a career in broadcasting."

Ten years later, all that seemed very remote and old-fashioned. I was a journalist in London, and I came up one grey November afternoon from the subway at Oxford Circus and was attracted by a huddle of people outside a shop. I went up and joined them. They were all peering through a plate-glass window at a Lilliputian conjuror producing microscopic rabbits out of a doll's top hat. He must have been a good conjuror because sometimes his face went quite black, and sometimes he disappeared altogether. The crowd was just like a collection of children at a Punch and Judy show. Most of them, no doubt, like me, were seeing television for the first time, and even the blase Londoner, fed on daily marvels, found his imagination touched. Not everyone, however. One voice was heard saing that it was going to be a nine days' wonder, and another that no one would be able to watch for more than a quarter of an hour at a time. And then a policeman came along and moved us on, just as the conjuror gave place to a chimpanzee who seemed much less camera-shy.

Now, 25 years afterwards, VARIETY tells us there are 110 million telcvision sets in the world, and I find myself looking after a Television Centre which is twice the size of St. Paul's Cathedral, and which has been built to produce 1,500 hours of electronic programs a year. It is a proud thing to be doing but it is not my career I am thinking about now but the BBC's, because it is, in all the essentials, the same BBC that was spreading over the country in 1926, and was introducing television to the world in 1936, and has now consolidated its position as one of the leading broadcasting organizations anywhere. One that gives advice and help to many other countries in developing their own broadcasting systems; at any one time there are over 100 BBC staff helping abroad. And people come from all parts to look at Television at Television Centre, and more to study our constitution and practice. The Government statement that "the BBC will continue as the main instrument of broadcasting" in Britain does more than describe our domestic position. It means we represent Britain among fellow-broadcasters throughout the world. We regard this international position as vital because it sets a stamp, a world stamp, on national public service broadcasting.

BBC's Strength

What are the strengths of the BBC's position? I think they are four. You might call them our four freedoms. The first is that we are incorporated by royal charter, and not set up by special statute, or any other means. This is an important safeguard. It protects the conception of public service. The second is that the Board of Governors is the body corporate. They are trustees and stewards. The definition laid down for them in the last debate in Parliament before the first Charter was granted in 1926 was: "an independent body operating the Service in the interest of the public as a whole." It still holds good. When one of the BBC's producers had to make a film the other day for distribution overseas in connection with this 25th Birthday and he wanted to demonstrate visually the BBC's freedom, he asked if he could film the Board of Governors in session. There is much more to this than a mere form of words.

The third strength comes from the way in which we are financed. The license system has stood test of time. It provides a steady source of income directly related to a scale of payment by the public. In 39 years all the developments and expansions of the BBC have been achieved with only two increases in the license fee, and the Centre in which I sit now was built without borrowing a penny. The fourth strength comes from the limitation of the powers of the Government. There is no Minister for Broadcasting. Time after time the Postmaster General who answers questions at Westminster on technical matters will point out that it is not his function to intervene in program matters. Of course we are constantly subject to pressures. We listen, and if we think we should, we resist, and successfully. We are neither a market nor a platform.

Nor, of course, are we any longer, in television, a monopoly. Whether competition has been a good thing for the public is debatable; it has certainly been stimulating for us who work in BBC Television. We get about 40% of the audience overall these days. We would like it to be larger. We could do it, too, because on national occasions or when we go all out for sport, or light entertainment, we are at least as successful as our competitors. Five years ago, for instance, people were saying that perhaps it would be better if the BBC stuck to an educational role, and left show business to other... They do not say it so loudly now, and especially since the BBC won the prizes at the world's first television light entertainment festival at Montreux last spring, with a program which was in competition, by the way, with Fred Astaire, Perry Como and Sammy Davis Jr. Our light entertainment shows are turned out at the rate of 60 a month, and they range all the way from spectacle to situation comedy.

To get that 50% of the audience, which is still our aim, there is one thing we will not do, however, and that is to cut down on the number of "serious" programs. Incidentally we do not accept the view that "serious" and "entertaining" are mutually exclusive), which we put on at peak hours. We have no ghetto in BBC Television. We

THAT R-REALLY GR-REAT 'SHEW'

All Kiddin' Aside, TV 'Still The Greatest Show on Earth'

By JACK BENNY

Hollywood.

Television is the supermarket of the entertainment industry. It has something for everybody.

All you have to do is shop around until you find it. True, sometimes you get stuck with a bad piece of merchandise, but usually you can turn up a bargain.

So I would like to go on record with a few kind words for the tv industry. It sure needs them these days. To hear some people, you would think tv is about as popular as The Twist at the Sadler Wells Ballet.

Complaints are hurled at the small screen from all angles and sources — government officials, educators, newspaper critics and by the public itself.

Some complaints are justified—especially concerning violence. I don't like to see violence on tv unless, of course, it's between an actor and a sponsor on some show opposite mine. That kind of bloodshed doesn't upset me at all.

Although I'm still considered a relatively young man, I have been on television 12 years. I also have four sets in my home, so when I'm not on it, I'm usually watching it.

People who criticize tv just for the sake of criticism or because it's the thing to do kill me. They usually don't take into consideration the number of hours television is on during the average week, the number of entertainment hours that have to be filled.

I don't like people who look at me as though I'm handing out free samples of bubonic plague when I ask them if they have seen any good shows lately. They explain in voices top heavy with frost that they don't watch "it"—that a tv set is about as welcome in their homes as a herd of dancing elks.

I feel sorry for these people. They're missing the greatest show on earth.

To show you what I mean, just take your regular television guide, the one that you buy or else comes in your Sunday paper. In this little book you'll find roughly some 120 hours of television for one week.

Yippee, For Free

Take a week like I did . . . around the holiday season that's over now. It was a typical tv week, although there was an emphasis on the Yuletide period. I'll tell you the shows I was entertained by. It didn't cost me a cent. I didn't have to get dressed up. There was no parking problems. It didn't cost me—well, I've already covered that.

If I didn't think television was invented just so Bob Hope and Groucho Marx could make the income tax people happy, I would say it was created for children. The shows kids can watch . . . Captain Kangaroo, Shari Lewis and her puppets, Bozo the Clown, Romper Room, Huckleberry Hound, Three Stooges, Yogi Bear, Magic Ranch, Soupy Sales, Bugs Bunny, Popeye and all the other wonderful cartoon people.

In the week I'm talking about, kids—and adults—were treated to a wealth of talent, sports, music, dramas, specials, feature films, some other good comedians, public affairs and kindred programs.

I even watched a few old movies. There were a couple that were offbeat—Jimmy Cagney didn't slug Pat O'Brien in one, and the other one was so old that Charlie Chan was in a patrolman's uniform.

All in all, television does a good job and has had some memorable moments . . . Ernie Kovacs' cigar went out . . . and Lloyd Bridges forgot where he was, and opened his mouth . . . the night Zsa Zsa Gabor admitted she was a lover of mankind . . . and Mickey Mantle cut himself shaving. Then there was the awful night music lovers like myself will never forget . . . Lawrence Welk beating time with his left foot.

I think television is a good thing. It's a great outlet for our emotions. It's entertaining and informative. But you have to know what you like. Me? I love it, that's all. It keeps my writers employed.

Weavers Nixed For Paar Show

A custom muted by time reared itself again last week in television, and as a result The Weavers were banned from appearing on the Jack Paar stanza over NBC-TV.

The folk-singing foursome was barred when they refused to sign loyalty oaths provided by NBC's standards and practices department. The oaths, asking them to state that they are not and never had been Commie party members, were rejected unanimously by the singers. Fred Hellerman, of The Weavers, said that his group felt strongly that no private establishment, in this case NBC, had the right to demand proof "of any citizen's patriotism." Hellerman and Lee Hays once invoked the Fifth Amendment during Congressional inquiries.

Paar was on vacation the night the singers were to have appeared. Sam Levenson was filling as host.

GLOBAL TALENT LEAD TO MEDIUM

By ED SULLIVAN

Spin a miniature globe of the world. Reach out your hand and stop it and it's fair to guess that on whatever country your finger comes to rest, our show either has visited or has imported performers from there to appear on our Broadway stage.

Ed Sullivan

Just for fun, I tried it last night. The first time I reached out and stopped the spinning globe, my finger came to rest on China.

It was only last summer that we were out there in Hong Kong. One of the cutest things that ever appeared on our show resulted from that trip to Hong Kong. On the waterfront, we taped a group of cute Chinese youngsters singing "Fair Harvard," in Chinese! The touring Harvard Glee Club was about to appear in that colony so the priest in charge of these youngsters thought that the men from Cambridge, Mass., would be touched when they heard these Chinese youngsters welcoming them with the Harvard song. He was right.

On that same trip, we filmed the impressively poignant Canadian cemetery at Sai Wan, outside of Hong Kong. Here are buried the Canadian youngsters overrun by the Japanese on Dec. 7, 1941.

Recently, I was walking my dog on Park Avenue and a guest in our hotel stopped me. In a New York City hotel or apartment house, you get to recognize other residents, as a result of meeting them in the elevators, or in the lobby. So you say hello to them and they say hello to you but, rarely do you truly get to know them.

All I knew about this fine looking gentleman was that he was a Canadian named Price. He and his wife had lived in the next apartment, on and off, for years, on his business trips.

"I was very touched by your reference to the Canadian cemetery at Sai Wan" he told me and continued: "I was the commanding officer of the Canadian Rifles when the Japanese attacked Hong Kong and the story of the Canadian expedition to Hong Kong is a tragic one. We arrived there just two weeks before the Japanese attack of December 7, 1941. We were without transport and equipped with only light weapons because we had been rushed out from Canada to join the English garrison of about 7,000 fighting men. The Japanese used some 65,000 men against us so, at least in defeat, honor was satisfied but our casualties were very heavy. And in the following 3 years and 7 months, in Japanese prison camps our casualties were even worse. But none of us who survived ever had seen the Canadian cemetery at Sai Wan and that is why your reference to it, on your show, deeply touched all Canadians."

I suggested we'd be delighted to forward a copy of this footage on the Canadian cemetery. "That would be a tremendous thrill to all of us, at our annual reunion," he said. He gave me his card. It read Col. John Price and in the lower corner, "Canadian Delegation to the U.N."

I spun the globe again. When it stopped, my finger rested on Russia.

Russia

We went to Russia, for our State Dept. in August, 1959. We were there for four weeks and entertained 250,000 Russians in Moscow and Leningrad. To represent the U.S., I took along Rise Stevens, Negro star Margaret Tynes and Hawaiian Charles K. L. Davis, all in the operatic pattern. Also bal-

Another Old Rule Collapses: Clients Advertise Advertising

By HENRY C. ROGERS
(President, Rogers & Cowan)

Hollywood.

Am pleased to report that it has been a long time since I heard a television advertiser say, "We do not believe in advertising, advertising." The business has changed. Publicity and promotion are no longer stepchildren.

It was not too long ago that agencies would make recommendations to their clients to spend $3,000,000 or $5,000,000 for a television series—but they would forget one thing. They would forget that it is not enough to put a television show over.

They would forget that in buying print media, they were buying guaranteed circulation. In television there is no guarantee. They would forget that the only insurance policy they could buy to get maximum "circulation"—that is, a viewing audience, was to back up their program with advertising campaign.

I saw it happen every season. Two or three months before a show went on the air, but long after the television budget had been locked in, someone—agency or client—would say, "Incidentally, don't you think we should spend some money for promotion?" Too embarrassing to go back for another $50,000, $75,000, or $150,000 for publicity-promotion and tune-in ads. Sometimes the problem was solved, more often it was neglected.

Agencies and clients now know that television is show biz. They now realize that in show biz, you must do more than just buy a show and present it. They realize that they must take a page from the books of the Cecil B. DeMilles, the David O. Selznicks, the Darryl F. Zanucks and the Samuel Goldwyns.

Gotta Do Something!

Network press and promotion departments are vying with each other in presenting dramatic and exciting ideas. The independent publicity organizations are wracking their brains to come up with unusual ideas to attract attention.

Is this good? Are we on the right track? Need ask?

Poll after poll, research project after research project have proven that fewer people are watching television. We had better do something to get them out of film houses and bowling alleys and back to the television set. Dramatic showmanship in publicity, promotion and tune-in advertising is the answer.

Long holdouts like General Motors and Brown & Williamson have finally recognized the importance of promotion. Add them to advertisers like Du Pont, Westinghouse, Procter & Gamble, Lever Bros., Scott Paper, Bristol-Myers, Kaiser, Alcoa, General Foods, Campbell Soup, Quaker Oats, State Farm Insurance, R. J. Reynolds, and you can see the drift.

We all know that advertising helps the sale of a good product. It cannot make a bad product successful. A strong program promotion campaign can add rating points to a good show. It cannot save a bad show. It is just as simple as that.

As for specials, I don't think anyone can argue. With a special, an advertiser only has one time at bat. There isn't time to build audiences. Consequently, the advertiser knows that he must tell the potential television viewer in dramatic fashion what show he is putting on the air, on what network and at what time.

Consequently, the need for "advertising, advertising" in the television industry has now at long last become an accomplished fact. There is no doubt about the philosophy of the American businessman. He knows that if he has a good product, he must advertise it. He now knows that his television program is also a product that must be "advertised."

What Makes a Good TV News Man? 'Typewriter-Fingers' With Blending of Personality

By JOHN CAMERON SWAYZE

One of the laudable developments in television is the increased attention given news by the networks, a move partly Minow-inspired but furthered by the discovery news could bring in important money. This was a detail local stations discovered long before but, no matter, news departments generally have benefited and so has the viewing audience.

However, if you look closely you'll note that the progress has been chiefly on the feature and documentary side. Most of the hard fresh news of the day on television is still served up by the networks via the standard 15-minute strips. This is proper, but how about improvements in the 15-minuter from the audience's side of the screen? Aside from technical advancements that allow more flexibility of presentation and make possible better film and tape segments are virtually nil. Let's itemize.

For one thing, too many producers and editors are still "picture happy." The theory that a certain amount of film HAS to be used is silly. There is nothing and never has been anything wrong with a man or a woman telling a story to viewers sans benefit of moving pictures. In the early days it was felt film should be used because tv news was still a novel commodity and film was the window dressing. At the time, this was sound reasoning. I remember the day just after the old "News Caravan" started I walked into the office of news chief Bill Brooks and told him I thought I should have about three minutes—barring evenings when some compelling story dictated a variation—in order to give a general picture of the news at the moment. I didn't get it and Bill, whose judgment was excellent, was right at that time. But times have changed.

For example, on tv today there's nothing I like better than to see an expert like Howard K. Smith, whom I've never met but whose work I admire, get in front of the camera without benefit of anything except himself and speak his piece. When he's through you know what he has said because it has been clear, concise and well and pleasantly presented. These are factors of first importance for the manner of presentation is a vital point that sometimes gets obscured in the shuffle. Television news at its best is a blend of journalism and show business in the matter of format and in the manner of those on camera. A good newspaper reporter is not necessarily a good television reporter. I'm a supporter of the theory that the man or woman who gives news over the air should be a reporter, although there are exceptions, as in any field, and I freely acknowledge that some experienced announcers are very competent. Some 25 years ago when I was a newspaper reporter myself, doing radio on the side from the corner of a Kansas City city room, I was rabid on this subject, partly, I suspect, because I was interested in keeping down competition in a field that even then looked like a good one from my typewriter.

Now when I say "manner of those on camera" I mean just that. I'm not talking about looks, voice or any other one aspect except to the extent each contributes—and they do—to the overall. I'm talking mostly about the know-how, the tv savvy that enables the guy at the desk or in the field to come across. It's the clarity and to-the-pointness of his contribution; it's that certain felicity which makes him a welcome guest for when you enter a home on a tv screen you're a guest among the family. "News performance" is a more precise description of his work than is the simple term "news presentation." I know the word "performance" is sometimes frowned on in the news shops, which is foolish because it's accurate. As a matter of fact, it's a word that just as aptly fits the work of the best newspaper reporters and columnists. They inject into what WW always calls their "typewriter fingers" something of their own personality and experienced know-how. They're not just punching out a story, they are performing at their writing machines. And that's what makes them head-up above the crowd.

Liabilities

Getting back to the use of film and tape, judiciously handled they should be used only when they contribute through content and quality. If this seems obvious, you haven't been eavesdropping around the news shops. The comment, "the film isn't too good but it's all we had," is an explainer heard too frequently.

Another liability that is creeping into the picture, literally, is the foreign dignitary who can't be understood. In an interview a reporter, who speaks in easy-to-understand American, asks the man from another part of the world a question and the reply is unintelligible. It isn't the poor guy's fault. He's probably doing better with our language than we could do with his and in personal conversation he may not be too hard to grasp because your ear has time to adjust. But it's different in the quick switch of voices and brief statement technique of tv. Gromyko is a case in point, although by no means the worst example because sometimes you can understand him. Just the same I've watched and listened attentively while he replied to a tv query and damned if I know what he said. Of course, in his case probably I just missed another lie so it doesn't matter. The solution to this problem is simplicity itself. Show the person from overseas speaking, so people can see him, and let the man at the desk in the studio voice the gist of his words behind the picture. Elementary—seldom practiced.

'Showmanship?'

I see in current television news, too, some tendency to switch from the central studio to reporters elsewhere just for the sake of the switch and not because these men can report the yarn better or have covered the story personally. The device of switching to a newsman at point of origination of news is solid when the development is a compelling one. This is especially so when it has been covered in person by the man who comes on camera. Even somewhat lesser but still substantial news sometimes can be handled to advantage in this way when the reporter has been on the story himself. Switching for a spot is also completely sound when the spot is given by an expert, let's say on political or military matters, who airs his views with authority from his vantage point, which likely would be Washington. Otherwise, the man at home base cover a story taken from wire service material just as well as a man in the field using the same source. And he can do it quicker.

But tv is a mild offender compared with radio. Here, the old 15-minute strip largely has been replaced by the five-minute program. Take time out for commercials, openings and closings and there are about three minutes available for news. Yet it has become regular practice to inject into these brief segments a report, live or recorded, from a staff man overseas or somewhere at home that takes, with intro, a minute. That's one third of the show. Stories that warrant such an allotment of time on so brief a program are few. The men at home base can cover two and sometimes three good stories in a minute when he's boiling things down. And a five-minute program should be loaded with news.

When it's sifted down the true test of either a television or radio news show is the way it leaves its audience. If the coverage has been adequate in scope and if it has been so presented that viewers and listeners have a clear recollection of what they have seen and heard, a feeling that they know what is going on, the program has been successful. To attain this a staff of top tv reporters and analysts, knowledgeable management and smooth technical operation are all required. Oh, yes, money helps, too. But, generally, if the show is there I think the money will come in.

Nominations For the Cutting Room Floor

By STOCKTON HELFFRICH

Just let the loudness of thunder increase: a few more holdouts get religion. Not all of the recalcitrants, but at least a few more.

If 1961 proved anything to us policemen, it is that more of the policed sought safety in virtue. More of them, and in concert yet, discovered there is extra mileage in morality. They took the pledge, sincerely in some cases, less so in others.

Truth is, in fact, damn near everyone was looking for a fire to put out, convinced there must be many to go with all the smoke. Being a fire-fighter came close to comprising a status symbol. And mixing that metaphor, the bucket brigade was bolstered with so many deputations of emergency policemen that the traffic for us gatekeepers bottlenecked and jammed as far back as the cynical eye could see.

All of which is to say there was hardly a soul around any longer unprepared to T-H-I-N-K. Used to be you saw that word THINK and you clicked like an IBM. Come 1961, in television, no longer just so. We went from THINK to MINOW and that new watchword for months had the industry in a tizzy, as if you didn't know. Can't see it hurt us. From where I sit (how's that for a disclaimer?) a fair share of the criticism was a long time overdue despite, as Code Authority Director Robert D. Swezey qualified it, critical "charges and requests . . . obviously unwarranted." Nailing it down he added, "On the other hand, some (criticisms) are so well founded that only in hypocrisy can we deny them."

The Hill & Knowlton folks analysing thought-leader criticism of television advertising found the barbs concentrated on such things as repetition, the number of commercials, taste ("too much "bust, belly and behind"), and those plugs identified as being "insulting to the intelligence," short on "believability" and long on "exaggeration."

Re taste, have never yet found myself in discussion of it without someone presuming same a gatekeeper's automatic preoccupation. Well, yes and no. Although taste considerations seem inevitably always to be with us, they do fluctuate in nature from year to year. Personal Products Advertising—deodorants, depilatories, bath oils, corn and callus removers, cold and headache remedies, foundation garments, laxatives and, it figures, toilet tissue, not to mention scouring agents for toilet bowls—all of these obviously present acceptability problems. I have to assume the Hill & Knowlton "bust, belly and behind" summation relates in some way (1) to the degree of audience exposure to these classifications of advertising in all media, (2) to the number of individual copywriter and production excesses at large extolling them and also, it appears, (3) to the number of placements of certain of these at questionable times of day in the broadcast schedule. Who does not know my old wheeze about copywriters who approach laxitive copy as though they were writing a Cook's Tour of the alimentary canal? And variations, but for sure, have shown up, to mix the metaphor, in other channels of proprietary classifications assiduously exploring the nasal tract, the axillary, the spaces between the toes and even the cleavage between that somewhat fetish-ridden area of secondary sex characteristics common to women.

But exceptions notwithstanding and saturation peaks aside, experience supports the observation that the potential for improvement in Personal Products Advertising increased during 1961. Approaches generally seemed to us in the New York Code Office more positive in specific classifications. In others, where comparatively the upgrading continues too modest (here's a felicitous phrasing!), at least a greater degree of audience tolerance was won through sheer latter day consumer familiarity with the facts of life and with the products ameliorative to them. Taste, in brief, continued to vary with time and as a result of so many surrounding influences that it was judged as we went along; relatively, approximately, conditionally and always with the realization that we were aiming for the best while showing some honesty in admitting to, and working to eliminate, what was clearly the worst.

More Than a Hope

Granted it is the kind of observation which perpetuates a die-hard like me in office for a further stretch, I sincerely believe, all the clouded atmosphere notwithstanding, television advertising and the programs which it supports are gravitating towards what honest folk have long believed desirable. But then I am an eternal optimist of sorts and have long held that, in this industry as elsewhere, people invariably want to be better than they are and/or than they are alleged not to be. Scoundrels are fewer than the sheep taken in by them. All that the average Joe of moderate influence needs is a good trend, the straight facts and

An American Success Story

Author Loathes The TV Medium That Made Him A Multiple Bestseller

By ALEXANDER KING

It all started something like this:

Sometime in 1955 I began to write my autobiography. By the spring of 1957 I had 184 pages done, and while reading my manuscript, late one afternoon, I suddenly suffered a colossal hemorrhage from one of my stomach ulcers. My poor frightened wife called a doctor, who instantly ordered me off to a hospital. I was rushed through the streets of New York in an ambulance which clang-clanged its way uptown through the theatre crowds of Times Square, and within the next eight hours my bankrupt circulatory system was enriched by six blood transfusions.

During the 17 days of my stay in the hospital I suffered many bitter misgivings about the future of my book. Would I live long enough to finish it? Would I have a long convalescence which would prevent my continuing with the job? Would some well-meaning editorial idiot hire some literary hack to complete my work in case I never got home alive? And other such thoughts.

At any rate, I did manage to survive somehow, and when I finally emerged from my sickbed, I took my 184 pages up to my friend Albert Hirschfeld for a critical appraisal. I brought it to him because Al, whom I have known for almost 40 years, was sure to give it to me straight. Incidentally, Hirschfeld has a wonderful book of his own on the market at the moment. It is called "The American Theatre," and covers four decades of playgoing by means of his fabulous caricatures.

Well, he loved the book and suggested that I let S. J. Perelman look it over. He also thought that Perelman, who is an old friend of ours, might be able to suggest a likely publisher for my opus.

All this I did.

Happily enough, S.J. Perelman was enthusiastic about my manuscript, and in fact he took it personally up to Simon & Schuster, his own publishers, to see what they were in the mood to launch it. It turned out that the publishers liked it well enough, and the only problem was, could I get it done in time for the on-coming season?

I not only got it done, it was actually published in November of 1958, and for a couple of weeks I was a very happy man, indeed.

Sad to say, it wasn't really quite so far, and it certainly wasn't quite so good—for the simple reason that nobody really gave a damn about an autobiography written by a comparative nonentity, no matter how wittily or sincerely the job might have been done. That is to say, all the pros in the publishing and theatrical world were familiar enough with my name, but most of the individuals in the professions quite naturally expected to get my book for nothing; with a suitable inscription, of course.

And then a really unexpected catastrophe fell down on me. There was a sudden strike of newspaper delivery people, and the couple of decent reviews I did get in the Times and the Herald Tribune were completely unavailable to the reading public.

You can imagine my despair.

So I ran frantically up to S&S, in the hope that somebody there would be able to think of some emergency measure that might help to rescue my treasured masterpiece from seemingly inevitable oblivion.

To tell you the truth, nobody was very optimistic about my chances. They'd managed to unload about 5,000 copies of the book (which covered their expenses as well as the $1,200 of my advance), and, by and large, they had pretty well decided that meanwhile they had all better concentrate on the saleability of some of their other books.

As a matter of fact, the original picture for my cover jacket, which I had painted myself, was still standing in somebody's office at the time, and the editorial occupant of that cubicle made it pretty plain to me that this work of art was seriously obstructing the traffic around the place.

It was a heck of a mess.

And then somebody suggested that it might be a good idea if I went on a couple of radio programs and tried to peddle my stuff to the public directly. Some authors had already done this, with mixed or even doubtful results, and I certainly was eager to try it—no matter how questionable the outcome.

The first program I appeared on was a radio broadcast that took place early Saturday mornings, and when I arrived at the studio the place was jammed with footloose, bewinged airplane hostesses and several troops of colored Boy Scouts. What's more, everybody was munching chocolate-covered breakfast cereals which the sponsor had freely showered all over this semiconscious audience.

I was shattered, of course, and when one elderly idiot showed me a dozen admission tickets that he had garnered for other broadcasts for the rest of the day, I'm afraid I was really rather rude to him. That audience simply got me down. There obviously weren't any book buyers among these people, and I was sure that most of them probably had great difficulty in deciphering even the large print on their comic books.

The man who ran that unbelievable program was one of those gravel-voiced homespun types that absolutely give me the willies. He told jokes out of old Farmer's Almanacs, and all I can tell you is that by the time it was my turn to join him on the podium, I was so nauseous I had to hold a protective handkerchief in front of my face.

Somebody had typed some wisecracks out of my book onto a sheet of paper, and although the chief gaucho, or whatever the devil he was, had the volume itself right on the table, I was convinced that this mildewed oaf had never bothered to read even the publisher's blurb on the outside.

He beamed at me, of course, and said, "And how do you feel this fine morning, Mr. King?"

"I feel like a prematurely born baby," I said. "I've been listening to you for the past half hour—and I can honestly say that I've never before in all my life been immersed so rump-deep in wholesomeness."

I really don't know whether anyone in that unfortunate gathering had the vaguest idea what I had said—all I can tell you is that they gave me a great big hand. This unexpected applause heartened me sufficiently to take complete charge. I ignored the questions of my interlocutor from then on and just proceeded to tell a couple of the briefer anecdotes out of my book. The time passed quickly enough, and when it was all over several of the people on my benefactor's staff came around to congratulate me.

"You were a wonderful guest," one of them said to me. "You ought to go on tv. You ought to go on the Jack Paar show. I think you'd be very good, and he'd like you."

Well, I'm not going to torture you with any minute recital of what happened to me in the next few weeks. Suffice it to say that I appeared on 11 different radio and tv shows, and the results, as far as my book sales were concerned, were almost negligible.

But, finally, I did make the Jack Paar show, which was broadcast in those days, live, from the old Hudson Theatre. The first time I was on, I didn't make my appearance until about 10 minutes of one, which meant that I had actually about four minutes on the air.

I was sweaty with anxiety, of course. I realized that I had to do or say something really startling if I expected to make any sort of impact on the listening audience. Fortunately, I'd had a letter that very morning from a dear newspaper critic in Texas, a man totally unknown to me, who had loved my book and deeply sympathized with me for my multifarious physical ailments.

Among other things, he had written me the following: "I understand you have only the fraction of one kidney left. I heard, or read recently, somewhere, that kidney transplants from one person to another have become feasible lately, and if this is really so, then please feel free to call on me. I have two sound kidneys, and you are welcome to have one of them. I would not offhand guarantee the soundness of any of my other organs, that come in pairs, but I am quite sure that my kidneys are altogether normal and healthy."

Well, I quoted this letter verbatim on that first Jack Paar program, and all I can tell you is that that studio audience laughed for a full minute and a half.

I was in.

I was in in more ways than one, since my publisher received orders for 28 thousand books in the next six days. That first volume of my autobiography eventually sold over 150,000 copies in hard cover, and about 2,000,000 copies in paperback.

So did my second volume.

The third one is on the bestseller lists and doing fine, too.

I have, in the past three years, appeared almost 200 times on tv and radio, and that original book jacket drawing of mine that was in everybody's way when my book wasn't selling was exhibited in nearly 50 bookshop windows all over the country.

During that time about 100 authors have peddled their products on the Paar show, and only Jack's own book managed to sell anywhere near as well as mine. Which only goes to prove that there is, after all, no surefire road to success, even if you do get exactly the same breaks as the guys who somehow, mysteriously, made it.

The real irony of the whole matter lies, of course, in the fact that I absolutely loathe the most of tv and think that as an entertainment medium it hasn't got a chance of redemption in its present form and setup.

But thanks, just the same,

The B In A Newsman's Bonnet — From Bizerte To Berlin

By IRVING R. LEVINE
(Mediterranean Director, NBC News)

Rome.

Many of the big news stories of the past year seemed to occur in places with names beginning with the letter "B"—Bizerte, Belgrade, and, of course, Berlin.

Belgrade proved a number of things. It showed that a Balkan country with almost no experience in international conferences could provide more efficient radio and television radio and television facilities for a great influx of reporters than even Geneva itself. More significantly, it proved that the United States should not be overly concerned while forming policies about the sentiments of so-called non-committed nations. Had the United States resumed nuclear tests on the eve of the conference (as did the Russians), many of the 25 leaders gathered there would gladly have stoned the American Embassy. Russia's action was criticized only intermittently by the list of speakers and often in moderate terms. Intimidation seemed to work. Since many of the unaligned leaders had come to power by fighting Western colonialism, they reflexively took anti-Western positions on almost any issue. Happy exceptions were mature neutralist leaders such as India's Nehru and Burma's U Nu.

The tragedy of Bizerte was not without its sidelights of grim humor. For example, the mayor of Bizerte showed an unseemly anxiety about getting his family and himself out of the city when the French attacked. He was replaced, but not before he became known as the "Deserter of Bizerte."

The biggest news story of all was Berlin with its incredible concrete wall and its terrifying prospects as a threat to peace. Many aspects of the divided city remain in the mind of a reporter. But probably the saddest sight I saw in Berlin because of its long term implications was at the Brandenburg Gate which is on the dividing line between East and West Berlin. Children from East Berlin carried bouquets of flowers to Communist police standing guard there. The children were thanking the policemen for protecting their city against Western aggression. Neither Kafka nor Orwell ever wrote of a greater distortion of facts in innocent minds. There are other sights that burn themselves into the memory on a tour of East Berlin. The tourist bus stops on Friedrichstrasse, the only street where East German police still permit holders of non-German passports to cross. Passports are inspected briefly by a Communist police officer who politely says "Danke Schoen" to each passenger.

Then the driver carefully navigates the bus zig-zag past concrete barriers which the Communists have placed in a staggered pattern to prevent a car from dashing through in a high speed escape. The West Berliner who had been the bus guide in West Berlin is, as a German, not allowed to cross the dividing line of his own city and he sits on the curb awaiting your return. An East German guide joins the bus on the Communist side of the line and announces completely non-propaganditic facts about the sights you see. The bunker in which Hitler died now simply a grass-covered mound. An electrical equipment plant named after Joseph Stalin. A gigantic monument honoring the 20,000 Soviet soldiers who died in the battle for Berlin. Stalin-Allee, or Stalin Avenue, with its Soviet-baroque architecture which causes a former Moscow resident to think he is back in Moscow. The guide points to apartment houses under construction in East Berlin, but when someone notices that there are no workmen around and no stockpile of construction material, the guide has no explanation. Understandably, she could not be expected to explain that all prefabricated concrete blocks, intended for apartment houses, were taken for the construction of the concrete wall that now divides the city.

Back in West Berlin with the West Berlin guide, the bus drives through streets where the heavy traffic is a contrast to the few cars on the road in the Communist part of the city and the stores stocked with luxury goods are the most striking material contrast to the drab window displays on the other side.

Regardless of which side of the concrete curtain they live on, Berliners take pride in their sense of humor and particularly in their custom of affixing nicknames to many things. West Berliners say that their East Berlin neighbors have become bitter under Communist rule and that the nicknames they apply to people and things now reflect bitterness rather than humor. For example, East Germany's Minister of Justice, a woman named Hilde Benjamin, is called "Red Hilda," and bearded Communist leader Walter Ulbricht is nicknamed "The Goat's Beard." West Berliners I've spoken with think that their pet names reflect a livelier sense of humor. This may be so, but even West Berliners' nicknames seem Germanically heavy to an outsider. The new square-shaped Symphony Hall is called "Symphony Garage." The new modernistic opera house is affectionately called the "Cream Cake" because of the rough texture of its stucco type front wall, and a new West Berlin office building is known as "Bikini House." It's been given the name "Bikini House" because it has a protruding balcony on top and an open strip across its middle. Even churches are not immune. A church, resembling a Nissen hut because of its curved roof, was dedicated to Saint Canisius. The Germans call it "Saint Ni-sens." On West Berlin's main street stands a church which was bombed hollow during the war. It was decided to leave it amid the chrome and glass new structures as a reminder of the horrors of war. The Germans aptly refer to it as "The Decayed Tooth." Still another church, quite new, is a low edifice of modernistic design that falls short of what its architects must have hoped to achieve. It looks something like an electric generator substation, and Berliners have been quick to notice this. It's not irreverently known as "God's Power House."

People of prominence, of course, are nicknamed. 85-year-old Chancellor Konrad Adenauer is "Der Alte." "The Old Man." West Berlin Mayor Willy Brandt is "Sonny Boy" and it takes only one glimpse of his scrubbed, alert, career face poised on his high white shirt collars to realize why.

Everything has a nickname but the fence of concrete blocks that divide Berlin. West Berliners, strain as they will, cannot generate good humor about it. They call it simply "The Wall of Disgrace." It would be difficult to think of a more fitting name.

'No Article This Year'

By MILT JOSEFSBERG

Hollywood.

After a dozen annual articles for VARIETY, I finally and firmly came to the decision—no article this year.

Okay, so it's VARIETY's anniversary. Big deal. Hoo hah. Everything and everybody has an anniversary once a year. My wife and I have a wedding anniversary every year, and by an odd coincidence it comes in the same month as VARIETY's. January.

So every Jan. 26 on our anniversar. does VARIETY write an article for me and my wife? It does not. On January 26 does VARIETY call us up on the phone and sing, "Happy Anniversary To You. Happy Anniversary To You. Happy Anniversary Dear Hilda and Miltonnnnnnn. Happy Anniversary to Youuuuuuuu?" It does not! (It's true that I did get a card once from VARIETY on my wedding anniversary, but this was pure coincidence. It was one of those "Fractured French" cards, and when my wife saw it she wouldn't speak to me for a week.)

However, in all honesty I must admit that the above soliloquy is not the sole reason for not writing. To be truthful, I'm not writing my usual epic this time because of topic trouble. No, it's not that I was short of topics—I had too many of them. Let me explain.

Since there's no doubt that I'm a brilliant genius, dozens of topics popped into my mind. However, I discarded them one after another for varied reasons. First I thought I'd write a character study called, "I Remember George." I'm referring to George D. Lottman, the man I worked for as a budding pressagent so many years ago. The late great Lottman who employed them all for A (For Al Lewis) to Z (for Zolotow, Maurice). George's publicity staff, at one time or another, boasted such well known names as Al Lewis, the writer-producer-director. Sid Garfield of CBS publicity. Al Rylander who heads up NBC's exploitation. Hank Garson, the tv and film writer. Paul Mosher of NBC. Les Zimmerman of Rogers & Cowan. Milt Josefsberg, the writer who won't write an article for VARIETY this year. Lottman was also indirectly responsible for Mel Shavelson and Jack Rose taking brief baths in the muddied waters of public relations. And, finally let me list the last of the living Lottman alumni (aphabetically, not chronologically or talent wise): Maurice Zolotow, the Broadway Boswell, who has biographed most of the big street's big shots. His most recent achievement was putting Marilyn Monroe between covers. (That doesn't sound right, "Putting Marilyn between covers." But it sounds good.)

George D. Lottman was an unusual man of many moods and diverse talents. Most people remember him as a pressagent. I prefer to remember him as a songwriter even though he only wrote the lyrics for two songs that I remember. Yet the words he wrote for those two tunes will be heard as long as our country and our civilization continues. It's a most peculiar parlay, but George D. Lottman wrote the lyrics to what amounts to our Navy's National Anthem, "Anchors Aweigh." And Lottman also wrote the English lyrics to the Hebraic chant, "Eili Eili."

So—No Lottman Salute

But I'm not going to write about George. If any of his disciples should perpetuate his memory I'd like to nominate Zolotow. Maurice may not have known George D. Lottman best, but he certainly can bat out a better biography than any of the current chop of scriveners.

So "Topic One," George D. Lottman was dropped. I tried another subject and came up with a topic tentatively titled, "Pet Peeves and Peculiarities of Comics I Have Known." Now there's a lovely literary subject for any comedy writer who digs unemployment. And, once again, I must be tiresomely truthful and admit that I enjoyed a wonderful relationship with every comic who ever hired me. I know this confession automatically disqualifies me from ever appearing as a guest on David Susskind's "Open End." I further realize that other comedy writers reading this will accuse me of applepolishing the bosses. But despite the reputation of writers rapping the comics, I'm happy to state I've always admired all of my employers, especially the one who took me to lunch for my birthday, bought me several drinks in honor of the event and then canned me that afternoon for being drunk. (I can see Jack Benny reading this and saying to himself, "Thank goodness people won't think it was me. Lunch I might take him to, but several drinks—never!")

My attitude towards the funny men who have hired me has always been similar to that of Jay Burton, the famed writer, bon vivant, and thumbsucker. Some years ago when Burton first started scripting for Perry Como he grew tired of the constant queries from people wanting to know what the "real" Perry Como was like. Finally Burton had business cards printed, and as soon as anyone asked the inevitable question, Jay handed the inquirer a neatly engraved card bearing the legend, "Yes, Perry Como is a nice guy." Goodbye Topic 2.

Topic 3 was immediately eliminated because it was titled, "How It Feels to Collaborate on a Script With a Beautiful Blonde of the Opposite Sex." I never got started on this particular project. It was a good idea, but my wife wouldn't let me do any constructive research on it.

Topic 4 was going to be a brief autobiography called, "Memories of a Mental Midget," but my wife scotched that one too. Oddly enough she didn't object to the title. Her beef was that when a man begins reminiscing it shows his age, and somehow she felt that my showing my age would make her feel older.

Topic 5 was called. "I Saw the U. S. A. the Bob Hope Way," and consisted of memorable moments of the five years and 382,000 miles I spent with Bob during the late '30s and early '40s. Topic 5, while rich in subject matter and filled with fond memories, died from the same ailment and reasons as Topic 4.

Finally I came to Topic 6, titled "I Gave Two and Three-Tenths Years of My Life to My Agent . . . or . . . 23 Years With the Same Man." Topic 6 was not a treatise on fidelity, but told of my spending nearly a quarter of a century with the same agent. I had real funny, funny gags like when we signed as client and agent. I should have been suspicious when he slipped a ring on my finger and put the words, "Till death do us part," in the contract. Oh, lots of jokes. But then I figured that it's a kicked subject. Knocking agents is the second most popular indoor sport in Hollywood. Too many jokes about their agents. Some one should defend them. Like when Joey Bishop appeared with Frank Sinatra and Dean Martin and said, "Why doesn't somebody talk about the good the Mafia does?" So goodbye my last topic—topic 6. I won't rib agents. After all, some of my best friends are agents. I respect them. And to tell the truth, I need them.

So that's it. I have no topic. I have no article. All I can do is start making notes for next year's article immediately. Or at least I'll jot down notes on why I can't write one.

'Networks Neglect The Kids': Keeshan

Minneapolis.

Here for personal appearances at Minneapolis Symphony orchestra children's concerts, Bob Keeshan, television's "Captain Kangaroo," asserts "the networks are neglecting the youngsters."

He said "we have the only daily program on the air nationally, and there surely is room for other."

Keeshan expressed the belief that this situation will remain "until the tv industry develops the patience necessary to permit the healthy growth of a program."

"A show must produce results immediately or it's shoved off the air," he explained. "There is no time for developing either a workable format or a sizable audience. The result is that the networks are content to turn children's programming over to the local stations, for better or worse."

Keeshan pointed out that "even 'Captain Kangaroo' had a rocky beginning."

"But CBS and the sponsors stood firm and this gave all a chance to grow up with the program," he said. "We're now in our seventh year, and it's amazing, I believe, how much more we cram into our program now then we did when we first started."

TV Alternatives for Britain

By HAROLD MYERS

London.

What does the future hold for British television? The first stage in answering that query will become known within the next three or four months when the Pilkington Committee, which for more than a year has been inquiring into the future of broadcasting services, will submit its report to the Government. That report will be the first step towards the legislation which will be enacted by 1964 when the existing BBC Charter and commercial tv licenses are due to expire.

Speculating about Pilkington has been a favorite pastime in the British tv industry for the past year or more, and that will undoubtedly go on until the report finally comes out. Meantime there is surprising confidence in both camps. BBC has put in a claim for an extra channel and for permission to run regional radio programs. Commercial tv interests have also staked a claim for a competitive channel, and powerful press, radio and tv combines have been agitating for commercial radio. They all believe they are going to get what they are asking for.

Lines Up To 625?

Additionally, several groups are in the running for pay tv, if the Pilkington Committee and the Government gives the go-ahead. And there is also a powerful agitation to switch line standards from 405 to 625, thus conforming with most of Europe, and for the introduction of color. There is confidence, too, that these claims will also be conceded, though the switch in lines may present technical problems and be introduced on a long-term spreadover basis.

It seems to be generally expected that 1964 will herald an expansion in British tv and radio services, but how the final legislation will take shape, may well depend on several unpredictable factors. Of prime consideration will be the economic state of the country at the time and the Government of the day may be reluctant to authorize the terrific capital expenditure involved in setting up new networks, if the country's finances are in a bad way.

Re Conservatives

There is little doubt that the Conservative party, which was responsible for authorizing commercial tv in the 1954 Television Act still favors expansion for the competitive system, though it will have to recognize the volume of political and public pressure towards giving BBC an equal chance in competing for viewers. In normal circumstances, the Conservative Government would undoubtedly still be in office come 1963, when the new legislation will be introduced in Parliament. But these are not normal times. There may conceivably arise a situation within the next 12 to 18 months when the Government may decide to go to the country and if that were to happen and the Conservatives were defeated, a Labor Government might take a different view.

As the Opposition during the passage of the 1954 Act, Labor showed its open hostility towards ending the BBC monopoly and giving a charter to commercial tv interests. Undoubtedly, some of that prejudice still holds good. It would, of course, be absurd to suggest that an incoming Labor Government would end the concession granted to the Independent Television Authority, but they may be lukewarm towards giving them extended services.

Profits 'Immoral'!

One of the unique features of the commercial tv maneuvers for a second channel has been the subtle campaign inaugurated early last year by Norman Collins, deputy chairman of Associated Television. He admitted outright that the profits of the independent companies were "immoral." The only way to curb these high earnings, he suggested was to provide the commercial companies with commercial competition. In other words, a second independent network competing for audiences and advertising revenue would be the moral solution. That campaign has undoubtedly had its effect in high places, though there are a few sceptics who believe that the profit intake will only go up if there is a second commercial web.

They base their argument on precedent. At the time when commercial tv was being launched there were justified fears among the national press and magazines that they would suffer as advertising revenue would be hived off to sustain commercial tv. Though some papers and periodicals have fallen by the wayside, press advertising has, on the whole, shown a substantial increase, and it is felt that this pattern will continue if there is added tv competition.

One of the principal moves by most of the commercial interests is designed to end the mosaic by which the three principal regions are divided among the four major companies. They all want a straight-forward seven-days a week operation, and not to be restricted to a five-day and a two-day week as happens at present. In the event that the second commercial channel is authorized and that point conceded, there appears to be little doubt that Associated Rediffusion and Associated TeleVision would become rivals for the London area, while Granada and ABC-TV would share the North of England. Two newcomers would have to be brought in to operate the Midlands region, which is now run by ATV on week days and ABC-TV at weekends.

BBC Quiet

The BBC has not been making a great deal of noise about its campaign, but in its own quiet way

'Why Don't You Write a Play?'

Or How to Plant Seed of Discontent in $1,000-a-Week Comedy Writer's Household

By HUGH WEDLOCK, JR.

Hollywood.

"Why don't you write a play?"

Herman Schlump was a tv comedy writer. He wasn't a big shot, but he wasn't a small shot. You might say he was a middle shot.

As part of the writing staff with one of the top comics in the business, Herman got a check for $1,000 every Wednesday afternoon—less his agent's commission and the various deductions, of course. Every Thursday morning, Ethel Schlump took the check to the Bank of America, Studio City Branch, and deposited $300 in their checking account. When she received the balance of the check back from the teller, $100 went into Ethel's purse (the Schlumps always liked to keep a little cash on hand for emergencies) and then she went next door to the Glendale Federal Savings & Loan and put the rest of Herman's weekly stipend into their savings account where it drew 4½% interest from the day of deposit.

This arrangement, Herman working every week, and Ethel going to the banks with the same regularity, had kind of a squareness about it—but there were compensations too. Ethel didn't have to go to the Laundromat anymore. She and Herman had their own washing-machine—and dryer—now, twice a week a woman came in to do the heavy cleaning, and once a week the gardener came to cut the lawn and trim the hedges. Ethel, of course, watered the lawn herself the other five days she wanted to, it gave her something to do, and Herman did it on Sundays, if the script was finished.

Once in a while, if Herman got home at a fairly decent hour, he and Ethel would either go to a movie or call some other comedy writer up and they would visit. Then the night would be spent talking "shop," knocking the comics, other writers, and all the tv shows, except maybe David Brinkley.

Now you may get the idea that Herman and Ethel lived a pretty dull life—and if you do, you could be right, but don't forget, Herman didn't know this, because Herman isn't as bright as the average person reading this article. After all Herman is only a plodding tv comedy writer working six, and sometimes seven days a week for a lousy $1,000, and getting nowhere in the Arts.

Well, anyway, to coin a phrase, "One day, it happ-ned." Herman had just come out of the parking lot from the gas station across the street from the studio (there was no parking space on the studio lot for him) and he bumped into a top tv writer who, at the moment, was on his way up to see a producer about a bubble for an idea that could make a story that he was willing to put down on two pages if the series hadn't used "the family needs a second car" theme yet for a springboard. (Wow).

"How's it going?" asked the top tv writer, "Murder," said Herman, "especially when you gotta do 35 stories a season."

Through With Ratrace

"I'm through with this ratrace," said the top tv writer. "I only do two or three a year and then I stay with the play."

"What play," asked Herman.

"Oh I thought you read about it in VARIETY," said the t.t.w. "I've got this play I knocked out and Dave Merrick wants to take an option on it. My agent's in New York now. As soon as I get the word, I'll fly back and will set the deal. Then they can shove this racket. It really stinks, doesn't it?"

"It sure does," answered our naive, hard working, financially well off, talented and dull hack, "but what can I do? I'm stuck. This is all I know."

"Oh don't be a jerk, Herman," said the top, "you're a hell of a comedy writer—you should write a play, too. Why, do you realize every time you write a situation comedy, that if you added one or two elements to the story, you practically got a play. Look, you do a script a week—alright, so Broadway's a little more demanding—so you take three weeks, five if you have to. By the time you kick it around with the producer, the director, the actors, extra pieces of business fall in, you polish it up on the road, and by the time you come to New York, you got a smash. Then you'll only have to write this jazz when you feel like it, not because you have to."

The seed of discontent was sown in Herman's brain, right then and there. He knew the top tv writer was right. He knew the only way to get respect in this business was to be important—and the only way to be important was to write a play. Herman made up his mind. All day long while he was struggling with the funny stuff for the top tv comic, he kept thinking of nothing else but the play. And when he got home that night he told Ethel all about it and he asked her how she would feel if he quit his job and went after the jackpot?

The Li'l Woman

Fortunately, Ethel wasn't the fainting type, Ethel just gave up. Here was a girl who, less than three years ago, did her own housework, her own laundry, her own hair, her own nails—she never did her own grass because she lived in an apartment in the Bronx and that was not her responsibility, but here was a girl who was living the life of a parttime sybarite, even though she didn't know the meaning of the word—and she was not about to give up this life. "Write a play, Herman? What are you nuts or something? Do you know how tough it is to write a play? Didn't you read Moss Hart's 'Act One?' Don't you know you can work for a year, maybe longer, without a penny coming in? Suppose it's a flop, then what? So suppose you wrote a play, Herman, I'll bet right now there are a hundred guys writing plays and they would quit tomorrow if they could get your job—you know why, Herman? Because you are working for a top tv comic and you are getting a check every week and they aren't!"

Herman was on the verge of protesting Ethel's argument, but her last words about weekly check discouraged him. Then deep, deep down in his subconscious the horrible thought occured to him that maybe, even if he wanted to, maybe he couldn't even write a play. However he saw no point in admitting this to his wife, but little by little he let her talk him out of such foolishness—and he even agreed with her that writing for a top tv comic was a pretty good way to make a pretty good living.

But there was one thing Herman insisted on—and he made Ethel promise that she would let him do it. If this show was ever dropped, and he was let out—while he was laying off—instead of freelancing, knocking around, trying to sell a story here and there—instead of that, Herman would write a play. Ethel said she had no objection to that—that was the smart way to do it—and Ethel is right—and Herman is right—but Herman will not do it, ever, because Herman is not smart—Herman is a $1,000-a-week tv comedy writer, who next year will be asking for $1,500 and settling for $1,250—and it will get tougher and tougher, and tougher, and tougher and tougher.

WRAP UP 'CHEYENNE' FOR '62-'63 SEASON

Hollywood.

Warner Bros.' "Cheyenne" series received what's believed to be the first renewal for next season with another semester assured for the western series on ABC-TV.

LAMENT FOR SHOESTRING AND ORCHESTRA

By HECTOR CHEVIGNY

"Did it ever occur to you," my friend asked, "that we would call them the good old days?"

"Call what the good old days?" I asked.

"Radio," he replied irritably. "Haven't we been talking about Radio as we used to know it?"

It was true that we had been talking about Radio as we used to know it but it had never occurred to me to call it the good old days. I said as much.

"You're not writing tv," my friend said.

"I've written tv," I said.

"Well, then?" my friend asked in a tone indicating there could be no further argument.

He wasn't one of the more famous writers in the business but his name had been on plenty of good scripts. His income had occasionally run as high as $90,000 a year. How good a craftsman he was I had reason to know first-hand, we had been teamed up on jobs from time to time. His experience went back 30 years. He had worked in Chicago, New York and Hollywood. Earlier this evening he had phoned to say he was in New York from the Coast for a couple of days to ask what I was doing, hence his presence in my livingroom with a drink in his hand.

"Well, I say those were the good old days," he asserted and with some of that sternness he used to assume when we were collaborating and I did not agree with something. He wasn't the older of us but he made more money so he could be stern when I disagreed.

"I'm willing to look back on Radio as the good old days," I said. Unlike my friend, I did not stay switched to tv writing after four years of it but returned to Radio, in which I stayed until last year. Now of course Radio drama is dead. I'm writing a book.

"Hey," my friend said, his face lighting up, "remember the time we had Carole Lombard on that script—when was it?"

"I don't know," I said. "1941, wasn't it?"

"Around that time." He laughed reminiscently. "I'll never forget it. Right in front of the whole damned agency she said the script stank."

"It was our script," I reminded him.

"Of course it was our script." He sounded as annoyed with me as he always had when I seemed slow getting a point. "But didn't she say it was because they should have gone for the first storyline we submitted?"

"Yeah," I conceded. "That's what she said." He was having such a good time remembering the look on the faces of the agency crowd, among them the guys who had said our first storyline stank and ordered a second, that I decided not to remind him that Carole's demand for a return of the first storyline caused us to stay up 48 hours rewriting the script in time for the show.

"A guy could always depend on Carole to stand up for what she knew was best," my friend said. I agreed that was so. "Of course, our first storyline did give her more to do." That had been the case too.

He stopped chuckling and we sat for several silent minutes stripping the little beads of moisture from our glasses—not our spectacles, our drinking-glasses. At length he said, "I don't care. Those were the days."

'Radio Drama Is Dead'

"Look," I said, "Radio drama is dead. They finally took it back of the barn, knocked it in the head and buried it. What's the use of crying?"

"Because it's dead," he said. "You're supposed to cry when something you loved is dead."

"Oh, cut it out," I said. "Something you loved. I wish I had a buck for every time I heard you ask whatever made you allow yourself to get sucked into such a business."

"That was just rhetorical," he said, placidly. "Just rhetoric. I had a course in Rhetoric once and had to make some use of it. Besides there was more dough in it."

"What, Rhetoric?"

"Pour me another drink."

"Just a minute," I said. "You mean to tell me you're not making more than you did writing for Radio?" He was working all the time.

"It's the truth," he said. "It's because of all the time-lag in tv. It didn't it used to be no more than two weeks sometimes between an okay on an assignment, the broadcast and the check. Okay, now it's two, three and even five months."

"But look at the difference in prices."

"I don't care. It doesn't even out. And something else. There's nowhere near the artistic satisfaction."

"The what?", I asked

"You heard me, the artistic satisfaction. You want me to tell you what's wrong with tv? You want me to tell you?"

"Okay," I said, "You tell me." I rose and took his glass to refill it.

"Too much dough," he told me sententiously.

"You just said you're not doing so well."

"Too much dough," he repeated, stubbornly. "It wasn't enough that the medium itself required more dough for production than Radio, they had to go multiplying the costs with spectaculars and the like which everybody thought they had to try imitating." He took the fresh drink I gave him. "Lux Theater used to have a weekly budget of around 23 thousand. We all wondered how they could sell that much soap but look at some

There's No Escape From 'Rating Blues'

By MAX LIEBMAN

Back in the legitimate theatre, after a decade of producing television shows, I was able to bear up under all the new costs and hazards because of the joy of knowing my show was beyond reach of the sorcerers who make up the tv ratings. The theatre, during my absence, had not become survey-prone. A producer was still considered competent to run his business without the divinations of the necromancers. He could rely on his boxoffice to tell him he had a hit or else had till Saturday night to get out of town.

Simple, eh? Why, downright pastoral.

Well, we opened our revue, "From The Second City," to generally favorable notices, some exceptionally good, and also won immediate enthusiastic word of mouth. The window was reasonably lively, the mail orders didn't break the postman's back but we were "building." This early prosperity and continuing public esteem emboldened us to think of ourselves as a moderate hit. But in a matter of weeks the boxoffice disagreed with our estimate. The pleasant rise in receipts stopped. Then they sank a bit and finally held at a maddeningly consistent level. We were doing well enough to meet the payroll and afford some promotion, and not well enough to enjoy the relaxation that comes to a producer when his show has found its place. We were an "in-between."

Suddenly it wasn't simple any more. Suddenly I knew something else: I was caught in the numbers racket again—there was no escape from the "Rating Blues." We found our rating in the boxoffice statement. This was a thing of inexorable fact, not of speculation and fancy as in tv. A boxoffice statement is a rating you can't dissolve in a clutch of Bloody Marys. But you can "explain" it away. I realized—rather, I remembered—the great wealth of folklore in the theatre that sheds a cushioning light on all hostile circumstance.

There have been classics among the excuses for poor theatre business. A whale on exhibit at a Hudson River pier was once called too much competition for 32 theatres, and once genuinely Milton Berle's Tuesday show in the early days of tv wrought destruction. It has always been too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry. Groucho Marx, when he was in the theatre, had a collection of zany alibis that were vocally accepted in all solemnity. The late Gene Lockhart was embarrassed when an actress in his company took seriously his quip that the slump could be attributed to the death the day before of the Bishop of Vienna. The actress regretted the passing of the eminent churchman, but thought his timing a little unecclesiastical.

Our general manager at the theatre, a stranger to perturbation, could be considered one of the most imaginative men patrolling a boxoffice. When I once complained that the night's receipts were lower than the matinee's, his look asked me why I had found that worth mentioning.

"It's dark at night," he said, and his gesture invited me to examine the sky.

Darkness as a causative of poor business in an industry catering to after-dark customers eluded me. But I didn't pursue it further. I knew that the "explanations" did not alter the mathematics on the statement.

How Not to Live With a 'Hit'

This boxoffice dissidence was all the more galling because the impression remained widespread that we were indeed a hit. I was showered with congratulations, and my friends acknowledged our success by imploring me to help them purchase choice seats. "Purchase" was a word of reassurance that they couldn't hope for passes to a sellout. Other friends, confident the show was in for a season-long run, said they could hardly wait for Spring vacation so they could take the kids. You don't disavow a hit, so you don't urge their sorely needed immediate support. The upkeep on a success image can run into money.

Meanwhile, back in the lobby, my general manager was singing the tunes in the extensive Shubert Alley repertoire: "Baby, It's Cold Outside," "Wait For The Silver Lining," "There's A Great Day Coming Manana," "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered"—(con spirito).

The next time I do a television show, I shall be well fortified with the optimistic spirit that I find in the theatre. I am confident that I can establish to the satisfaction of a tv sponsor that a low-rated show serves him best. Any researcher worth his salt can make a fine case for the absence of listeners from any given tv show. The family is all down at the store loading up on the sponsor's product.

"Comfort Me With Apples..."

By STAN DELAPLANE

San Francisco.

Over the weekend, I did a tv show. I feel quite dismal at these things. But tv people are convinced that if you play barrelhouse piano, you will be a bearcat on the violin.

"It is just like writing," said the tv people. "Only here you say it. Make it comfortable for yourself."

"If you will sit here," said the makeup man, "we will put on something to cut down the glare. Now just make yourself comfortable."

I should say this was done in a large studio. There was a good deal of moving cameras—these things are mounted. They require the same energy as if you were moving a grand piano. There was plenty of noise and activity.

"If you are going to do this sort of thing regularly," said the makeup man, "you should get a hairpiece. We all come to it," he said with a sigh. "Are you comfortable?"

"Certainly," I said uncomfortably. The makeup man began spreading brown grease on my face and drawing pencil lines on my noggin. "A little optical illusion," he said with a smile.

"The main thing," said the director standing beside me, "is to have fun with it. Relax."

"Think of it this way," he continued with a holy look in his eye. "You are in your own living room. A couple of friends have dropped in. You chat. That's all."

"Who are my friends?" I asked.

"Your friends tonight," said the director consulting his script, "are Rosemary Clooney, one of America's top recording artists, and her talented husband, the famous actor, turned director, the distinguished Jose Ferrer."

"Close your eyes," interrupted the makeup man. "I want to cover up those bags."

"Do you think they will want to be my friends?" I said. "When I look so terrible?"

"Just be comfortable with them," the director advised.

Well, no use going into details of this shambles. I can only say that when I stepped down on the line, "I have as my guests . . ." I not only stepped down. I tripped over the rug, too.

I tripped over several lines. Between takes—this means each time they take the picture, over and over and over and over—the makeup man hustled up with powder and puff in hand.

"Don't forget what I said about the hairpiece," he said.

"I shall never forget it," I said bitterly.

"All right," said the director, "let's do it once more. Take 11."

This important production will appear somewhere and will cover 27½ minutes.

I started at six in the evening. I finished at 3 a.m. next morning.

"You looked great," said the director. "You looked comfortable."

I wish I'd said that.

The Angry Manheim

By MANNIE MANHEIM

Hollywood.

I have been asked by some who are on the outer fringes of the television dodge, whether Perry Mason is all that he's cracked up to be.

Certain suspecting viewers have urged me to comment upon Mr. Mason's unbroken string of victories in the courts—but the request is that I probe into depth and not simply offer the obvious observation that Mason always wins and the district attorney loses.

Reluctantly, then, we examine microscopically, the case against Lawyer Mason. Our first suspicion is directed toward Lieut. Tragg of the Homicide Dept. of Earle Stanley Gardner's successful domain. And what do we find?

Well, we're not about to accuse Lawyer Mason of splitting fees with Officer Tragg but we do suspect a certain amount of hanky-panky. Those who are ardent Masonites are aware of Tragg's soft-spoken, extremely polite demeanor, that he is a veteran on the force and devotes all of his time in tracking down suspects who later find themselves in that miniature courtroom, being defended by Lawyer Mason.

Now this can't be all coincidence. Not for a period of five years. So, as we said before, we must believe that there is a link some place between Tragg and Mason.

Delving deeper into depth, we, reluctantly again, must charge that Lieut. Tragg has made at least 200 false arrests. Now, that doesn't look very good for the Los Angeles Police Department, a most efficient group.

We must further charge that Tragg, by picking up the innocent defendant each week, also places the District Attorney in a most unpleasant light and actually makes Mr. Burger, the D.A. appear to be incompetent. We can go further than that—during the five years of Mason's exposure on the tube, District Attorney Burger has been the literal laughing stock of those in the law business. This is most unfair to an honest public official.

It is our feeling that Chief William Parker of the Los Angeles Police should call Tragg in for a heart-to-heart. Parker must ask Tragg how come you don't ever catch a guilty killer?

Why Always the Gal?

Our probe also reveals that a certain amount of guilt should be charged to the Colgate people who sponsor Mason's weekly victories, courtesy of Tragg. Although Colgate's commercials are not truly germane to Tragg's indiscretions, we cannot neglect to take note of the injustices pictured in the Colgate commercials wherein their boy and girl bad-breath scenes have yet to reveal any unpleasant breath in the males of the duos—always the females.

Our research discloses that regardless of whether the male and female are about to kiss in a car, a boat, at an airport, or wherever, it is always the male who disappears from the scene because of the female's lack of Gardol.

Of course we don't connect Lieut. Tragg with the commercials but researcher doesn't pass up a trick, as they say around the stationhouse.

We don't desire to cast any aspersions upon the legal ability of Mr. Mason nor do we complain about the private detective work done by character Paul Drake. It's just the whole picture that causes us to wonder whether Drake's job isn't a cinch because Tragg has hustled in the innocent ones? And hasn't Drake prospered financially, too, otherwise where would he get the money to purchase those cut-spoken sport jackets?

We do compliment Mr. Mason upon his dignified manner which reminds us, although we hesitate to mention an unpleasant moment in our electronic history of those quiz contestants who had all the answers and played it cute and coy.

Another point, quite unimportant but still a point, is that, invariably, Lieut. Tragg can open any desk drawer and come forth with a shooting iron. This situation has made such an impression upon us that we are considering the purchase of a new desk complete with revolver-drawer. We were going to menton that the filing cabinets at Tragg's precinct seldom have more than one or two folders in them— but we won't hang the rap for that on to Tragg as it's quite obvious that the prop men who have charge of filing cabinets in the medium of tv are not about to put many folders in them. In Sheriff Andy Griffith's files, there's absolutely nothing except a coffee cup or pot. But Sheriff Griffith is a long way from Lieut. Tragg of Homicide—but, for some unknown reason, we believe that if Andy Griffith were hired to handle Tragg's job, he might very well arrest a guilty killer and Lawyer Mason would then find that he was not the Babe Ruth of the Courthouse.

Now if we can get Jose Melis to quiet down the midnight volume of his orchestra, our mission for this year would be fulfilled.

The Actor As Actor

By EUGENE BURR

A few months ago, doing a DuPont Show of the Week, I managed to stir up a minor tempest in a miniature teacup by perpetrating what columnists, network executives and other fauna indigenous to the wasteland were pleased to call weird casting. I had Cesar Romero, longtime suave Latin of the leaping celluloid, playing a heavy dramatic role as an Austrian Jew in a concentration camp; Frank Lovejoy, he-man hero, as a Nazi colonel; Jerry Lester, erstwhile harlequinading host of the no-longer-open Broadway Open House, playing a straight dramatic role; Paul Tripp, the Mike Todd of the moppets while his Mr. I. Magination was functioning, in a sharply etched and bitter characterization; Enzo Stuarti, a fine singer who had just clicked handily at the Persian Room, in a delicate and pivotal dramatic role; Cliff Norton, a fine comic, playing a far-from-comic fellow named Hitler; Edward Atienza, another singer, as a companion-piece named Himmler; Lou Nova, the occasionally horizontal heavyweight, pretending to be an SS captain; and a hitherto unpublicized young actress named Sandy Smith in the lone feminine role. As a concession to accepted sanity, such stalwarts as Russell Collins, Tom Gorman and Doug Parkhirst were also in the cast. But their presence wasn't enough to still the bleats of wonder at the "unconventional" selections listed above.

Despite the yawps of the innocent, however, the casting wasn't unconventional at all. It was merely the fortuitous concentration in a single show of a practice I've been following since the days when dinosaurs roamed through Shubert Alley. It's a practice based on the hardly startling theory that a good actor knows how to act.

This, it would seem, is self-evident. Yet it's amazing and discouraging to realize how many of the impassioned amateurs who are entrusted with the task of allocating jobs to actors fail either to realize it or to act on it. It's so much safer, of course—particularly if you have little more than a nodding acquaintance with either your job or the field in which you work—to latch on to a personality-purveyor who happens to have the personality you're seeking at the moment, or to hire an actor who has just finished playing approximately the same role in a different play. That way, you're safe. You're also denying to the good actor a chance to prove that he knows the fundamentals of his craft. Or his art, if you want to get stuffy and studio-ish about it.

For to the good actor (and "good actor" is really tautological, since an actor is either good or else no actor at all) his own personality, his body, his face, his voice are merely the instruments upon which he plays. If he's conscientious, he perfects those instruments — but he uses them merely as means to convey, to the best of his power, the maximum impression of the character written by the playwright, and to achieve, through them, the maximum emotional effect upon an audience. They are the means, not the end, of his art.

The actor superimposes the creation of the playwright upon his own personality. It's only the amateur who permits his own personality to determine the limits of the characterization. And it's only the amateur who casts according to personality or type. If you know what you're doing, you know that sincerity and technique and emotional contact with the audience in one type of role guarantee the actor's ability in other types; you know that effective interpretation of a serious song indicates the ability to interpret a role effectively; you know that a man who can sway an audience at will in comedy can sway them at will in tragedy too, providing he's mastered the basic instruments of his trade. And, if you know your own business, you know whether or not he's mastered them. The late Leslie Howard was one of the greatest of drawing-room actors; he was also the greatest Hamlet I've ever seen. (And the Hamlets I've seen include everyone from Barrymore to Evans and Olivier).

Type casting (and its mongoloid cousin, personality casting) takes two-thirds of the excitement out of theatre and theatre-going. It levels out the wasteland so feelingly described by the Minow that tries to act like a whale. It takes the heart and the blood out of acting, and denies the theatregoer or viewer the thrill of watching an actor act. Yet it's the usual approach to the choice of actors for any series of roles. It almost always has been — stretching back from today's television to the balmy days when Broadway floated high on a river of bootleg gin. Because, of course, it's easier. And it hides any lack of talent or knowledge or perspicacity on the part of the fellow who's doing the choosing.

How Bogey Got 'Bagged'

On the ironic side, take the case of Humphrey Bogart. For years on the stage, before he was more than a vague name to the gold-filled Hollywoodenheads, Bogey was a leading man, mostly in drawing-room comedies; you rarely saw him behind the proscenium without the protection of a hard-boiled shirt and similar accoutrements of the pre-depression princeling. Then Gilbert Miller, a knowing and highly talented theatreman as well as a producer of plays, cast him as Killer Mantee, gangster chieftain, in "The Petrified Forest." The type-casters shuddered and echoed their warnings of doom; but Bogey's performance was sensational. It was so sensational that when the play was bought by the satraps of the cinema, Bogey was bought along with it. He duplicated his stage impersonation on celluloid, to equal acclaim. And from there on in, this fine actor, who for years had been permitted to appear only in the etsy-petsy vagaries of parlor comedy, was permitted to appear only as a gangster or thug. One restriction was of course as ridiculous as the other.

Of the many tragedies that type casting has caused, probably the most pathetic was the case of Moffat Johnston. Johnston was, without question, one of the greatest actors on the American stage. He appeared in play after play, in roles that ranged from tragedy to comedy (in the latter category, he was the original male lead in "Twentieth Century"), from Nazi generals to French detectives to Bowery bums. In each, he was superb. In each, he so sublimated his own personality, he so completely and convincingly wrapped himself in the characterization provided by the author, that it was quite literally difficult to recognize him from part to part. And, of course, he wasn't recognized. The critics knew it was the same actor—after all, they had programs to tell them. So did a few playgoers. But general recognition was denied him—while personality players, not worthy of strutting on the same stage with Johnston, leered and postured and permitted the enamored public to sample their gimcrack wares, and went on to acclaim and swollen bank accounts and places in the Pantages pantheon.

Johnston was not only a good actor; he was also an intelligent man. As a good actor, he refused to abandon his ideals of good acting; as an intelligent man, he knew what they were costing him. So at last, in desperation, he wrote a play for himself in which he would play a detective who appeared in no less than 17 complete and dissimilar disguises in the course of the three acts. In that way, he felt, the public would be forced to realize the extent and effect of his powers; they would be forced to realize that all these parts were being played by the same man.

The play was tried out in summer stock, and was successful enough to get backing for a Broadway showing. It opened its pre-Broadway tour in Philadelphia, and the reviews were a series of hosannahs. At long last, Johnston was receiving the acclaim that, through long and weary years, had been his due. Before the play reached Broadway, he died.

Anyhow, ironic or tragic—or just downright stupid—type casting remains the standard and the rule.

Except, once in a while, when the chance comes, to cast actors instead of personalities, and so bring the excitement of a long-dead "living" theatre to the television screen.

TV: If Paul Revere Hadn't Taken That Horse Ride

By GERALD ADLER
(Managing Director, NBC Int'l Great Britain)

London.

Give or take a few horse shoes for Paul Revere or eye-whites at Bunker Hill and Americans might still be singing the "God Save the Queen" lyrics when the band strikes up what we all think is really "My Country 'Tis of Thee." And with this Colony of ours still British, how different American television would be today:

"The Untouchables" would be about India; Perry Mason, as a good British barrister, would sport a powdered wig. "Tic Tac Dough" would be called by its British title, "Criss Cross Quiz"; and while the grand prize on the famous Hal March quizzer would still have been 64,000 it would have beeen in shillings, or about $9,000. "Route 66" would undoubtedly be named after Britain's only superhighway, "The M 1" and could probably only last for 13 episodes (the M 1 is rather short). The title of "Naked City" would have new meaning as, in the tradition of the British bobby, not a single member of the squad would wear a gun. And with the continued serial so popular in the Mother Country, "G.E. Theatre" would be a cliff hanger, with each story running for six episodes. Finally, just as it is on "Sunday Night at the London Palladium," the big act on "The Ed Sullivan Show" week in and week out would be none other than—"Beat the Clock!"

The programming battle cry would not only be "Down with violence!" It would also be "Up with sex and freedom!". We would have prime time programs just like those back in England, where in recent months viewers have been offered frank studies of such subjects as rape, infidelity, homosexuality, prostitution, abortion, birth control and veneral disease. These would even be cheerfully interrupted, as they are in England, by cheerful messages from such sponsors as Thomas Hedley, Ltd. (known in the Colonies as Proctor & Gamble). The crew at the "87th Precinct" would have to avoid all violence but, taking their lead from the BBC's successful "Inspector Maigret," would be allowed to inquire who is sleeping with whose mistress in just so many words. Boys would be inspired to play not with guns but with girls.

Here FIDO

"Saturday Night at the Movies" would mean just that and not an NBC series—all because of FIDO. This is not an English spaniel, but an organization of exhibitors headquartered back in the Mother Country that is known in full as the Film Industry Defense Organization. FIDO threatens a theatre boycott of producers who sell features to television. And Bobby Kennedy could gnash his teeth all he wanted to—under the Queen's far more liberal laws this is not an illegal restraint of trade.

On the other hand, we wouldn't be plagued with the custom of starting network shows on the hour and half hour. For the Colonies could have the same privileges as those enjoyed back in Britain today, with major network shows beginning at such times as 9:35 and 10:06.

But gone, for the most part, would be our luscious weather girls. Instead approaching low pressure areas would be described in the most staid BBC manner by the most staid Whitehall types, probably sent over to help with the subjugation. For how can we organize a revolution tomorrow if we don't know if it's going to rain? And how do we know what it's going to do after watching a technically correct but uninspiring forecast? The impenetrable British calm and understatement, so appealing in moments of crisis and strife, would ruin our weather shows. We'd be hard put to concentrate on learned paper being read to learned society. Neutral tones are OK for politics, but to get across the weather the announcer must care—and he should care—we are all on the same side. General Kennedy might well run into a disastrous storm as he tries to Cross the Delaware, all because he missed the significance of a forecast of tempest and turmoil that was delivered with the same tone and expression that usually tells of changeable dull periods. The fifth column of deadpan weather men would stop the Movement in its tracks.

Of course we would also have the anomaly of the advertising magazine. As with today's television in Britain, every station would carry a couple of soap operas that are one continuous series of commercials. While a "Dr. Kildare" set fractures on one channel, the competition would fracture equally large audiences with a series like "Jim's Inn:" "Evenin', Jim. Pint uv best bitter, please." "Evenin' Charlie. Say, that's a smashin' new raincoat wheredya get it?" "At all leading stockists, Jim, it's an Ajax only five guineas an' the best part is that it's waterproof on both sides another pint please Jim." Because we would not be permitted sponsored programs, the FCC (as does Britain's ITA) would insist that these playlets contain nothing but advertising. Please, Sir Newton, don't send us to gaol—we didn't realize that some honest entertainment had crept in among the commercials.

And keeping track of the programs of these various companies would be not one TV Guide, but a separate program magazine for each network. Throughout Britain today there rests atop every television receiver two program weeklies—one published by the BBC, the other by ITV—each carrying the program listings for its own network only. This is because each of the networks retains the copyright in the titles and descriptions of its own programs. Carrying the tradition to the Colonies, pity the poor citizen of N.Y. or L.A. as he struggles homeward each Friday weighted down by seven different program journals.

Thus we can see that were we still British, some of the changes would be improvements, some the contrary. But we would each be paying a license fee to Her Majesty's Post Office for the right to own a tv receiver. Commercials on the air or not, that £4 would be due each and every year. And yet all stations would be restricted by Her Majesty to a maximum of 50 hours of broadcasting per week. We'd be paying $11.20 per year for the privilege of only seven hours of programming per day.

What's that? No "Late, Late Show?" Not even "The Late Show?" And no "Today" until tonight? Don't tread on me! No taxation without nauseazation.

C'mon lads, into the harbor w' these zoomars.

Work in Progress:

The Roosevelt Years

On the third floor of a modest Manhattan apartment, a work is in progress.

It is probably the most ambitious Work yet undertaken by Television. It is the Work called The Roosevelt Years.

The apartment is that of the most intimately concerned of the many consultants on the Work. It is the apartment of the world's greatest living authority on Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Mrs. Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Without Mrs. Roosevelt's records and remembrances, the Work could hardly be complete. Her spirit is bringing to the Work an intimate dimension that could come to it in no other way.

Other workers are at work in vast numbers on the vastness of The Roosevelt Years. Norman Corwin and a large staff of writers are coping with the outsize dimensions of those years. A large staff of editors is sweating down tons of source material.

Charlton Heston, who began, in the Roosevelt years, to grow toward his present stature in the drama world, will stand in for the voice and vigor of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Robert D. Graff and Ben Feiner, Jr., executive producer and producer, respectively and respectfully, of the Churchill series, are bringing the same insights to The Roosevelt Years, in the same capacities.

You will not see the results until the Fall of 1962.

But we thought you'd like to know that such a Work is in Progress.

Divertissement: Macabre

(Paul Monash, the producer of 'Cain's 100,' another new NBC show, also had a problem scene in the first show. 'We had a man killed in what I thought was a tasteful way,' he explained. 'Then the network suggested that perhaps we could just have him arrested instead of being killed.'"—Cynthia Lowry, Aug. 25)

Breathes there a fan with taste so high
He doesn't like to see them die,
By knife or pistol, roped or maced—
But always in consummate taste?

By hurling (from an aperture)
Or deep within l'affaire d'amour,
Bottled, broiled, or baked in beeswax,
Cicatrized or tied in cheese-sacks,
D.O.A., or decimated,
Energized (or enervated),
Fractured, frenzied, fainting, frantic,
Galvanized by charge gigantic,
Hanged when hooded, hacked in haste—
But always in consummate taste?

Immersed in wine, impaled, or ill,
(Jay-walking Jack admiring Jill),
In kayak, kissing, killed by kin,
(Or laughing at absurd East Lynne),
Mobbed while crying "Memento mori,"
Nudged to Nemesis (or Glory),
Squeezed by octipi in ocean,
Paralyzed by poisoned potion,
Quavering (or even quipping),
Raped by Jack (whose hobby's ripping),
Slain by sword drawn from its sheath,
Gnawed by Saber-Tooth's great teeth,
Shot in ulna, vest, or waist—
But always in consummate taste?

Slain like Xerxes, Zwingli, York,
(Or, as a baby, dropped by stork),
By rack or wreck, embraced or chaste—
But always in consummate taste?

And if in killing we can't be tasteful,
Put them in jail—which is less wasteful.

'Unencumbered By Extended Narration'

By GEORGE KIRGO

I hate to blow my own horn, but did you see the reviews of my last (latest, that is) special, "Yves Montand on Broadway"? Two facts emerge from these critiques: (1), that "Yves Montand on Broadway" was an hour show; (2), that it was an unqualified success.

From a personal point of view, it marked the apex of my television-writing career. It was probably the finest song-and-dance special I've ever written.

Don't laugh. It's not easy to write a song-and-dance special. Everybody's so busy singing and dancing that the spoken word has to fight to be heard. This is especially true when you're dealing with talents like Yves Montand or Polly Bergen or John Raitt. Nobody wants them to talk; audiences are satisfied just to hear them sing. Or, if you've got a Bobby Van or a Helen Gallagher, as long as they're dancing, that's enough.

Thus, producers—and even the performers themselves—are content to let them do what they're paid for: sing and dance. They're making a serious mistake. Some singers and dancers go their whole lives just singing and dancing—often with disastrous results. Their speech becomes atrophied, they're never booked for talk shows, they lose the ability to communicate. I know one major star who can't order a meal unless Harry Sosnik is conducting behind him.

Fortunately, there's a trend toward the spoken word in musical specials. Lately even the commercials have begun to be spoken. A script means extra expense and effort—but it's worth it, as those producers and performers for whom I've written will, I'm sure, testify. Take Yves Montand. After the show, he cornered me on the studio floor and went on and on about what he thought of the script. Since he spoke in French, I'm not quite certain of what he said. But he couldn't have been nicer.

Another reason for hope is that the critics, pioneers as always, are devoting increasing attention to the scripts for song-and-dance specials. For example, John P. Shanley of the N.Y. Times pointed out that the Montand show was "unencumbered by extended narration." Bob Williams of the N.Y. Post astutely observed that there were "no wasted words." And Ben Gross of the News was as discerning as ever in noting that the "bright and gay hour" consisted of "song and inconsequential talk." I've never had such raves!

Most gratifying of all was Gross' comment, "Inconsequential talk"—that's my trademark. Call it continuity; I'm not sensitive. After all, what's a show without continuity? I'll tell you what it is—it's a show that doesn't continue!

T'ain't Easy

Don't think it's easy to write inconsequential talk; it's the toughest thing in the world. Take an apparently simple introduction like one I wrote for John Raitt. I had John say: "Now . . . here is Yves Montand." Sounds simple, doesn't it. Believe me—ask any writer—it's not simple. Do you know how long I struggled over that "simple" intro? Trying all sorts of variations, like "Here now is Yves Montand," "And now here he is—Yves Montand," "This is Yves Montand," "Yves Montand, here he is," "I want you to meet Yves Montand," ad inf. No, it's not easy, it's not simple. It sounds simple because it's so absolutely right: "Now . . . here is Yves Montand." Flows, doesn't it? But only after gruelling labor, hours of soul-searching, and at least two cups of black coffee.

Do you see—you producers of song-and-dance specials particularly—do you understand now the value of the spoken word? If your latest show failed to please the critics, was it because you wrote your own continuity? Was it because you hired anybody to do it? Someone who wrote lines like: "And now here is Art Carney." (What's right for an Yves Montand is not necessarily right for an Art Carney. An Art Carney requires something a little different, like: "And now is Art Carney here?")

Don't underestimate the worth of le mot juste. Song-and-dance specials don't need many words, just the right ones.

And trust in the critics. Many of them are as perceptive as the one who wrote of my last show (latest, right?): "The script was perfect; you could hardly tell there was one."

SHOWMAN FOR INT'L EXCHANGE

By VAL PARNELL
(Managing Director, ATV)

London.

Ever since I found I had some influence as a showman, I have worked hard to make my outlook more and more international—believing simply that entertainment and the exchange of artists and ideas can be a big factor in helping one nation to know another.

Val Parnell

For many years in the theatre I strove to bring a truly international atmosphere to popular entertainment. Not only because the new blood moving between the world's capitals helped to keep the theatre alive, but because every successful star can help in some way to sweep aside the average myths and barriers which one people may build up against another.

Now in television, the task has become much heavier and far more important. As managing director of Associated TeleVision, a powerful company in a powerful world-wide medium, I feel keenly the need to make the most of the impact that millions of tv screens is bringing to ordinary people across the globe.

We have in our hands the most important medium of communication ever known. No one in history ever had a greater chance than we have in this age of anxiety to foster goodwill, to cut down outmoded prejudice by giving ordinary people in their parlors the chance of seeing how their opposite numbers in other lands think and live.

It is because I believe so strongly in this kind of cooperation that I am glad to write for the 56th anniversary issue of VARIETY, which has done much to make show business an international affair.

And this might be the right time—and the right place—to consider the kind of cooperation in international tv we would like to see in the future.

It seems clear enough to me that tv can make a real contribution to knowledge among the world's peoples only if the traffic of programs is given a real chance to flow freely in both directions.

A few years ago, the Americans had much the same world monopoly of exported tv programs as they had in the cinema in the heyday of Hollywood. Today, as British films and British artists get a stronger foothold in the U.S.A., so do our television programs.

TV Improves—On H'wood

Now it is certainly true that Hollywood gave the world, in general terms, a somewhat distorted view of American life. TV has done better. Out of America, as well as entertainment programs, have come a spate of documentary and serious programs which have done a vast amount to offset the Hollywood picture and give people in Europe a balanced picture of American thought and events.

But it is essential from every angle that this should not be a one-way traffic and that programs from Britain and other parts of the world should be given a fair chance of a showing on the American networks.

We in Associated TeleVision have made a big effort to present British TV to the world. Since 1955, through our subsidiary company Independent Television Corporation (ITC), we have sold abroad a run of British-made TV programs worth $29,400,000.

In 1961 alone, 2,800 British-produced half-hour programs have been sold in the dollar area. One of them, "Danger Man," won a place on the CBS coast-to-coast network at a peak viewing hour.

THE BIRTHDAY—THE BIG ONE

By SAM KURTZMAN

Hollywood.

Not too long ago Clifton Fadiman wrote an excellent article in Holiday magazine on the subject of turning 50. Al Capp did an amusing syndicated column on the same subject a few months ago. Some seasons back one of the networks presented a dramatic show dealing with this theme that was both powerful and touching. Apparently all writers were turning 50.

Being a writer, I knew that it would have to happen to me too. But it did not scare me.

Like any fearless American, I decided to face it. Taking a deep breath and tensing my muscles, I walked into a dealer's showroom and bought a sports car, complete with cap and gloves and can of paint for writing clever slogans on the doors. As soon as I think of one I'll write it.

Going on 50 was nothing to be worried about. I asked my barber for a crew-cut simply because it was autumn and the days were warm. Don't think I was trying to act like a youngster. I certainly did not subscribe to Boy's Life, although I did begin buying Playboy.

Obtaining that collection of rock and roll records was simply a personal research into that kind of rhythm. Believe me, Nothing wrong with a man of 49 going for the Platters or Johnny Mathis. I don't have to limit myself to Rimsky-Korsakov and Lawrence Welk.

Writing for information about the Grand Prix just meant that I could think young. It wasn't meant to make me appear juvenile any more than taking up the Flamenco guitar was to make me appear romantic. It's just that I was developing new facets.

Any other reason was absurd. And if I never had an interest in sports, couldn't I walk down the Boulevard and listen to the ball game with a plug in my ear? Transistors aren't only for kids, you know.

What I'm trying to say is that the impending birthday did not worry me.

Not at all.

And then, last December, on the 11th day, it happened.

At a quarter to seven in the morning my wife kissed me and shouted, "Happy birthday, dear!" And here I must explain something. I did not faint because of fear of getting old. It was the earliness of the hour.

And at breakfast I did not scold the children because I had become a grumpy old man. It's just that I did not think it appropriate to eat corn flakes with 50 lit candles around the plate.

So let's make one thing clear. I was in the best of spirits when I met my 50th year on this earth. Although I did try to verify the calendar by phoning the Naval Observatory at Arlington for the exact year according to sidereal time, and although I kept checking the month and day on all newspapers, and although I kept adding and substracting and conferring with chronometry experts at U.C.L.A., I wasn't trying to postpone my birthday. It was just to make sure that the day of merriment had arrived.

Only one thing I objected to. Those loud-mouthed newscasters on radio and television didn't have to shout the date. I knew what day it was. They didn't have to rub it in.

Besides, I wasn't the only one. There were plenty of others in the same boat. There must have been lots of babies born that day 50 years ago.

JFK Changed Everything

When quite solicitously my wife inquired what kind of party would be appropriate, it wasn't bitterness that prompted me to tell her to draw the shades, turn off the lights and sit quietly.

"That's all the celebration necessary," I explained. And it wasn't because of acrimony. I just didn't feel important enough for everybody to make a fuss over.

"For God's sake," my wife argued. "Aren't you taking this a bit too hard? The other writers didn't fall apart. They wrote funny things about it."

"Sure," I answered. "A 50th birthday used to be a jolly occasion until John Fitzgerald Kennedy came along. This young man became President of the United States at the age of 43 and loused everything up for anybody over 44."

My wife understood. She quietly bit her lip and craftily maneuvered her face to our clothes drier to evaporate any tears that might form.

"And I'm no kid of 44. I'm a full grown boy of 50."

Just then the door-bell rang, and some friends dropped in. Trying not to put a damper on the party, I joked, "Anybody know some sad birthday songs?"

But it wasn't a good joke.

Then another couple arrived. The husband was a famous comedy writer who could cheer anybody up with his quick barrage of one-liners. But tonight he was thoughtful. Maybe because I didn't go for his first eight or nine gags.

"What's the matter?" he asked.

"Nothing," I answered. "It's my birthday."

"Which one?" he wanted to know, almost sensing what was causing the gloom.

I didn't answer. I just shrugged, gently, not really asking for pity.

"Oh, the big one," he guessed.

I nodded.

"Too bad," he commented. Then he sat down.

Later more friends came. They all wore informal sports clothes, but for some strange reason I happened to have on a dark suit and a somber tie. There was nothing mournful or funereal in my manner, although I did find myself sitting in the middle of the room while everybody seemed to be staring at me.

They just sat in a circle and looked at my gray hair. Why couldn't they gaze down? Why couldn't they stare at my young shoes?

Pretty soon everybody began leaving, and wishing me the very best. I thanked them and hoped to see them again under happier circumstances.

That night was very dark.

It may have only seemed dark. We usually do not draw the drapes in our bedroom, as we like the view of the city lights. But that night I must have pulled them shut.

Although there were no real flowers in the room but only the ones on the wallpaper, I could have sworn that I smelled their fragrance. Were they moving closer and surrounding my bed? Was someone standing over me, speaking in mellifluous phrases?

No. It must have been the radio announcer. We had set the clock to let us fall asleep to FM music. What's strange is that they played only one piece of music. I'm sure they played only Faure's Requiem.

The night wore on and on.

Why did I have to be 50?

In the morning a wonderful thing happened. I awoke.

TV In 10 Years: From Infancy To Old Age

By MAURICE ZOLOTOW

Behind the criticism of television programming—which increases in quantity, severity and loudness—there is the constructive hope that something can be done to make television better in the way of art, entertainment and education by Government fiat or good-will or internal reform. The hope of reforming television seems to motivate all the attacks on it from Government officials, critics on newspapers, persons within the industry, and well-known citizens of good-will. I agree with the criticism. But I don't see any hope of improvement. The decline of television is inherent in the nature of television. No matter what laws or resolutions are passed, television is bound to grow more banal as time goes on. In a mere 10 years—from 1949 to 1959—television lived through infancy, childhood, adolescence, maturity, and is now dying of old age. I don't see how the process can be arrested.

Let us see why this is so. Unlike other forms of emotional and intellectual communion, television alone is non-regenerative. On the one hand, it soon exhausts its audience. On the other, it rapidly exhausts the creative workers on the other side of the picture tube—the writers, directors and performers. Television drains away their energies relentlessly but, unlike the situation in the theatre and the cinema, does not provide a breathing space and a happy ambiance in which the soul can renew itself for another assault. Television exists in a repetitive time-cycle of daily, weekly or monthly broadcasts, and this is as true of the educational and uplifting program, such as "Open Mind," as it is true of the western show.

Television is debilitating to an audience. During its popular years, it was usually watched every night in the week for as long as five hours a night. The effect was to dull the senses as time went on. Those who continue watching television become afflicted with a chronic apathy. They sit in torper watching the little images flicker by, without any emotional response. Ennui is engendered even in the stupid. Great entertainment personalities—a decade in the making—quickly come and quickly go, having bored the audience. To arouse the audience out of its lethargy, the television producers inject more massive doses of sexual sadism, bleeding corpses, torture and mutilation, unusual techniques of murder. This too soon sates the audience. One can get sated with anything on a daily diet.

The Escape Medium

Because television is available without even the trouble of walking a block and because it is free, one begins by using it to escape from fatigue after a day's work in the office or factory. The more intelligent, the more sensitive, quickly find, after six months of televiewing, that their fatigue is not erased as it would be if they had seen a good movie in a theatre. And even those watchers who make fewer demands grow bored. They may continue to watch it but like sleepwalkers in a hypnotized state.

I think the best kept secret in the television industry is the enormous decline in the total number of viewers, and in the intensity of viewing in 1961 as compared to, say, 1951. The surveys with their "top 10" only reveal what percentage of persons looked at what. But how many were watching television that night? Nobody knows for sure. There is no boxoffice in television. (After all, 75% of 20,000,000 is less than 50% of 40,000,000 viewers). And the surveys do not attempt to define the pleasure, pain, boredom, or excitement of the viewer. Nor do they tell us whether he really wanted to watch the program or was just killing time.

My impression is that there must be at least a 25% drop in the number of persons who regularly watch television as it was watched 10 years ago. Almost all the persons with whom I come into contact—and I am including persons on every cultural and economic level of society, including the working class—have entirely given up watching television. In many families of which I have some knowledge, only younger children, under age 10, still faithfully watch television. And nobody talks about the programs they saw last night (except when Jack Paar is involved in one of his periodic crises—Paar is the last personality in television who engenders controversy and anecdote and "did you hear what he said last night?" and even Paar is getting worn out by the pressures and will retire when his contract is fulfilled). There is rarely the excitement of looking forward as people used to look forward to the Sid Caesar "Show of Shows" on Saturday night, the Milton Berle "Texaco Star Theatre" on Tuesday, the "Philco-Goodyear Playhouse" on Sunday when one saw the hour dramas of Paddy Chayefsky, Robert Alan Aurthur, Tad Mosel, and N. Richard Nash.

The television audience decreases steadily but the advertisers don't know it. The surveys tell them, on the basis of projecting a percentage of a cross-section of a 3,000 sampling, that they are reaching an audience of 30,000,000 when they may, in fact, be reaching an audience of 7,000,000. Nobody knows for sure. Everybody in the industry is aware on the basis of his own circle of friends that fewer and fewer adults are watching fewer and fewer programs, but everybody assumes that the "masses" are still faithful. Nobody wants to find out how much the faithful have shrunk. Why drive the sponsors back to advertising in newspapers and magazines?

Television, because it is repetitive, gives neither its writers nor its performers an opportunity to regenerate themselves. The movie star makes one or two films a year. He shoots in France, Italy or Hawaii as well as Hollywood. He works with different directors and new kinds of stories. The television star is a machine grinding out the same piece of sausage once a week with the same director on the same sound-stage in Burbank. The Chayefskys were driven out of television not so much by sponsor taboos or rising costs of production as by this non-regenerative quality of television. To write a good play is one of the most difficult works of man but when it is done for television it is over and forgotten after one performance and "all's to do again." They had to do it four to six times a season. No relief from the pressure. It just isn't possible to invent the incidents and conceive the characters for six good one hour plays a season. Not even Chayefsky could do it. For the theatre one writes a play and each night it plays to an audience of only 1,200 persons and it runs for two years and you have the leisure to contemplate the material of your next play without the deadening pressure of the television profession in which your best products are as evanescent as your worst.

I can see no fundamental reform that would cure the ailments of television. The good old days of 1951 are gone, never to return. Television will continue to decline into senility. There will be plenty of apathetic boobs willing to drowse their way through filmed situation comedies, westerns, crime shows and cartoon situation programs. But for those of us who seek entertainment or diversion and want to hear singers and bands and comics, we'll go to night clubs, or just buy a few beers at the neighborhood tavern and talk to our friends for laughs if we can't afford a night-club. If we want to see a play we'll go to the theatre. If we want to see moving pictures we'll go to a movie house, where the films can be experienced on a proper screen and projected in focus. For television there is no hope, regardless of whatever reforms may be imposed on it from without or within. It can only go on doing what it is now doing but more and more clumsily. It is nobody's fault really. It is just the nature of the television beast.

Once You Know How It's Easy

By MAX SHULMAN

(SCENE: THE PROGRAM PLANNING OFFICE OF A LARGE TELEVISION NETWORK. AT RISE WE FIND TWO PROGRAMMING EXECUTIVES, BOTH NAMED "DUB SPRIGGS," ENGAGED IN AN EARNEST CONVERSATION)

DUB #1: I suppose the thing to do is play it safe and come up with another half-hour comedy. But I guess I'm some kind of a nut. I just don't believe in playing it safe.

DUB #2: Exactly the way I feel! Reach for the stars, not the mud.

DUB #1: Right! Nothing ventured, nothing gained.

DUB #2: Precisely! It's better to die on your feet than live on your knees.

DUB #1: Sound thinking! All right, what kind of program should we come up with if we're not going to do a comedy?

DUB #2: You know, nobody's ever done a series about the coast and geodetic survey.

DUB #1: Or about midgets.

DUB #2: Or about dental technicians.

(THERE IS A LONG SILENCE)

DUB #1: Come to think of it, what's wrong with doing a comedy series if it's offbeat.

DUB #2: Not a thing—just so it isn't too offbeat.

DUB #1: Offbeat, but identifiable.

DUB #2: Right! Fresh, but familiar.

DUB #1: That's the ticket! New, but old.

DUB #2: All right. Let's start by eliminating what we don't want to do. First of all, we definitely and positively don't want to do another domestic comedy.

DUB #1: Right! Our hero cannot be a married man.

DUB #2: Right! But that brings up a problem—how are we going to get kids into the series? You got to have kids for comedy.

DUB #1: Maybe he could be like a widower with a bunch of kids.

Dub #2: That's the Fred MacMurray Show.

Dub #1: Maybe he could be the kid's uncle and he lives with his sister who's a widow.

DUB #2: Bob Cummings.

DUB #1: All right, so he doesn't have to live with his sister. Maybe the sister is dead, too, and he is raising the orphan himself—and better still, with the help of a Chinese houseboy.

DUB #2: Bachelor Father.

DUB #1: I got an idea. Let's make the kid Chinese and the houseboy an orphan.

(THERE IS A LONG SILENCE)

DUB #2: What fools we are! The answer is staring us right in the face. Why don't we have the guy married, with a wife and kids?

DUB #1: Great. And he's in show business.

DUB #2: But he's also a hillbilly.

DUB #1: And an undercover man for the F.B.I.

DUB #2: Brilliant! There it is, all in one package—glamor, intrigue, homespun humor.

DUB #1: You see, pal, there are few problems that will not yield to the hot, white light of sustained thinking.

DUB #2: Right! Man is but a reed—the weakest thing in nature—but he is a thinking reed.

DUB #1: Right! The man who won't be beat can't be beat, and the man who can't be beat won't be beat.

DUB #2: Well, buddy boy, all I can say is—

DUB #1: Yes?

DUB #2: We've done it again.

THE WALL

By AL SCHWARTZ

Hollywood.

The wall had gone up practically overnight. Tall and formidable it sealed off E. Television from W. Television; E. Television, the haven for educational programs, and W. Television defined as a huge Wasteland. The wall had been built in such a hurry it cut off Huntley from Brinkley.

Tension had been mounting steadily. The issues had been defined and the battle lines drawn. On the East side of the wall stood Lawrence Spivak, Professor Baxter, and Eric Sevarid, their I.Q.'s bared and ready for combat. Facing them on the West wall was a battery of experienced stalwarts; Robert Stack, Jim Arness, Perry Mason their ratings unsheathed and sharpened, alerted for quick retaliation.

Uncertain days lay ahead.

The mood of the times was best summed up by one viewer in the following manner: "Thank God we live in a democracy where we still have freedom of the dial."

The Complete Script

By JULES ARCHER

George Outthink, Amherst '55, worked for an ad agency in the East 50s which was too Madison Avenue to have a Madison Avenue address. Thanks to George's brilliant psychosensory campaign idea, "Smell what has happened to Schlmiel's," the agency was on the verge of pining this $20,00,000 deodorant account. Schlmiel Brothers needed one tiny extra push.

And George had it. Why not convince the Schlmiels that the agency handling their tv package, "The Poconos Kid," didn't really have any idea of the show's impact when it sprang into the homes of the vast land. Why not show the Schlmiels how it played in the average livingroom?

The account exec decided to toss it in the waving blendor and see what fizzed. So they hired a tv repairman in New Jersey to bug a typical suburbanite's set. The house he chose belonged to Seymour Y. Gassmeyer, 51-year-old candystore owner.

One week later the agency received a tape of the first completely integrated audience-and-cast show in tv history. The Schlmiel Brothers were invited to listen, and smell what had happened to Schlmiel's when it jumped off the script and into the circuits. This was what they heard:

SUSIE: Johnny! Commercial's almost over!

JOHNNY: Coming!

ANNOUNCER: . . . and now our story.

POCONOS KID: I didn't wana kill nobody special. But they was too many kids wantin' a quick reputation. Like my pappy always said—

MR. GASSMEYER: Turn that durn set down or I'll kick it in!

JOHNNY: Okay, Pop, okay! . . . How's that?

SUSIE: Now I can't hear it!

MR. GASSMEYER: Good. So go do your homework.

POCONOS KID: . . . where I kin find Doc Zweibach?

OLD-TIMER: Sure. Effen you answer me a question just.

POCONOS KID: Whaddeya wanna know?

MRS. GASSMEYER: Susie! Where's the change from the lunch money?

SUSIE: Ain't any, Mom. I had the special.

(BANG! BANG! BANG! BANG! BANG! BANG! BANG! BANG! BANG!

POCONOS KID: You hear somethin', Old-Timer?

OLD-TIMER: Trouble! Down yonder—Doc Zweibach's place!

POCONOS KID: Come on—it's a fight goin' on!

JOHNNY: Leggo this pillow! Leggo. I'm warnin' ya!

SUSIE: You big pillow hog. You already got two! Mom!

MRS. GASSMEYER: Stop it, stop it, stop it! My nerves can stand your fighting maybe, but not the sofa legs!

MR. GASSMEYER: Off is going the tv, I'm warning . . . !

JOHNNY: Okay, okay, we stopped . . . Here's your darn old pillow, stinker. Satisfied?

DOC ZWEIBACH: . . . thought I'd never see you again, Kid. I -- I -- gimme your hand.

POCONOS KID: Doc, they put 28 slugs in you!

DOC ZWEIBACH: Ain't nuthin', Kid.

POCONOS KID: Who done it, Doc?

JOHNNY: Oh, Pop! That's a dirty trick!

MR. GASSMEYER: So report me to the S.P.S.A.!

At the end of this tape, the Schmiel Brothers decided that "The Poconos Kid" would need a new sponsor, and their $20,000,000 would be used in newspapers, matchbook covers and whispering campaigns to the effect that their competitors' deodorants had a base of whale ore. But George Outthink kept them in tv and won the account for his agency. His plan was little short of genius, and may shortly be imitated by every agency on the Avenue. Schlmiel Brothers still sponsor "The Poconos Kid."

Only now the scripts are written with space breaks every three lines to allow for audience participation.

COMES THE REVOLUTION—

By JAMES J. GELLER

Hollywood.

If television is a "wasteland," the inevitable corollary would follow that it sustains regularly heavy financial losses. Instead, the current annual statements of profit exceed all previous years. The princely terms and residuals paid to performers, directors, producers and packagers lend credence to a bizarre postulate that toiling in a "wasteland" can be beautiful and fruitful in an Affluent Society.

During one of the recent probes of the medium in Washington at the taxpayer's expense, it was established to no one's astonishment that the questionable programs are the responsibility of sponsors and networks. Who else? There's no point in squandering public funds to settle a truism taken for granted by the occupants of 50 million American homes.

Thus far I've searched the FCC reports in vain for any fire directed against the ineffectual writers who supply the programs and the vastly more ineffectual employers who systematically champion them week after week.

Let's begin with a commonplace: a project which demands a new script each week or month should first assess the writer above all componenis involved in the enterprise. Networks and account-executives will lavish upwards to a whopping $500,000 for a "special," not counting the line charges for a single hour. If you scrutinize the budget, you readily discover that the expenditure for the script is insignificant compared with the players and direction.

I often speculate who was the first to decree that members—I mean the genuine ones—of the auctorial craft should be grateful for a disproportionate share of the cash awards. Whoever inaugurated this arbitrary rule should in association with his supporters be propelled in some special kind of hell. Let us hope that this inequitable policy be reversed to the rightful advantage of any skilled and imaginative writer.

In the beginning was the word, but not according to many of the soulless spirits entrusted with the teevee channels. Perhaps in the near future an able writer will be honored not only with a fastidious critical acclaim but in the cold coin of the realm; his pickings should be quadrupled over anyone participating in the festivities. Now then, in the preparation of those richly touted "specials" in which the original themes demand infinitive variety, mood, natural dialog and a kinship with humanity, the ancient canard that mass audiences are allergic to sublime composition, must be rejected.

Knowing A Writer: A True Gift

It is true that in publicity handouts, advertising, commercial teevee trailers, and announcements, the author's identity is lost in the maze of super-abundant credits. It is also true that a deplorable omission of rational editorial judgment in the selection of competent authors ruined many a program. It would be redundant to cite the countless players who were paralyzed because of mediocre material. It can be said that the network, sponsor and agency emissaries who are often directly accountable for the program fiascos, have a glorious dexterity for clinging to their posts. If the opulent purchasers of the time slots and their ambassadors were gifted with a little more editorial acumen, there would be fewer failures.

Nobody need remind me that there are many other teevee offerings such as panels, news, sports events, interviews and the like in which the author's role is merely perfunctory or negligible; consequently, I exclude these pearls from my velvet and chaste strictures. My targets are those weekly series, "spectaculars," and others of allegedly high dramatic voltage.

Confronted with a voracious appetite which even four decades of old movies cannot appease, television is a glutton for all kinds of material, good or bad. Since a big gap exists in the medium suitable for civilized presentations, it offers dazzling and endless opportunities for stunning, touching and lively entertainment. If queried on this score, everyone within the sphere of influence piously concurs.

When the ruling set accepts a script or adaptation, it proceeds under an erroneous theory that the manuscript is flawless. No writer or group of writers possess the divine afflatus to furnish weekly or monthly masterpieces. Let us also doubt the infallibility of the network and agency officialdom. Small wonder that the bulk of the programs are guillotined after the initial run.

I am often amazed that the tv overlords haven't rendered sufficient heed to this critical aspect. They should recollect, if old enough, that back in the golden era of vaudeville, a 10 or 20-minute sketch was worked over meticulously and tried out of town before hitting the big time. Even versifiers, one-act specialists, and short story professionals consume unlimited hours while communing with the creative muse.

Admitted that the exigencies of tv schedules does not permit this freedom. There is, notwithstanding, a practical escape from this dilemma which in my effort to be constructive, I offer as an unsolicited suggestion. As the first step, I recommend that the network delegate some one with intellect, wisdom and enthusiasm and back him with good, old fashioned collateral in his serious quest for the most brilliant authors and playwrights who conceivably might be attracted to teevee. Those who signify a willingness should be engaged with a minimum of delay. By permitting the writer three months for a first draft teleplay and, say, one month for revisions, the time element is conquered. The same process is repeated with a dozen additional writing talents assigned to different chapters. This experiment could undoubtedly prolong the program's longevity and popularity.

If a script is approved under the above circumstances, it should then be tested before any size audience. If so, any weaknesses in the writing, playing and direction can be remedied before release over the air. If the author lived up to his reputation, he should be quickly signed for two more segments the same season and upon the most generous terms ever enacted. The same terms and conditions shall apply to the other 12 members of the writing staff who likewise discharge their obligations with outstanding literacy and enjoyment. Yes, I am not unmindful that under my simple plan the total writing cost might at first glance stagger the sponsor but if it is phrased with a cogent and sincere argument, he might agree that authors of eminence are the safest investment for a weekly teleplay on any coast-to-coast network.

In order to survive, American teevee is inseparably linked to private economy. The huge annual billings of the network chains keep soaring consistently, but it is not axiomatic that the commercial instinct of Madison Avenue and the networks matches their direful editorial accomplishments.

Anyone attempting to follow my not-so-startling scheme should wage warfare against the underlings who profusely scatter the story content around as a witness gesture to impress the boss. The obscure byliner of this immortal treatise once looked after the story requirements for a half-hour anthology series sponsored by Eastman Kodak. I was instructed to submit copies of the themes to Eastman's national agency which spared no three deploying two youthful representatives and the client special film adviser in offices adjacent to mine on the lot. This trio in turn transmitted scores of mimeographed comics of my recommendations to the Supreme Troika, viz, the local and New York top council of the agency and the company's brass in Rochester with copious, irrelevant and indecisive opinions. The submissions which managed to escape wholesale slaughter and excommunication were purchased and duly assigned to adaptors.

As soon as a director and the leading player approved a teleplay, I had to hand over 15 copies to the three satellites parked at the studio who again repeated the routine by dispatching them on to their superiors for final accord. Not even the author of "Titus Adronicus" would have emerged unscathed if any of his brainchildren risked this traumatic experience.

Too frequently the unconscious will of these frustrated editorial sages triumph; indisputably, a major cause for the inexhaustible teevee flops.

Among the immortals, the dramatic muse rates the topmost praise in the arts. I am sure that one network vice president in charge of programming was conversant with this dictum. In a recent issue of VARIETY, he endeavored a practical and sound application but failed. He lamented the dearth of distinguished writers for a high-budgeted series of one hour plays. Although his offer was a little more liberal than is customary, he encountered no sweeping success and brooded over his disappointment. I began to bleed for him. With my inveterate second nature of flying to the aid for an emolument, of course, of a network executive in distress, I immediately airmailed him a blueprint that would lead him out of the wilderness. If I'm not lacking in ordinary modesty, it was a revolutionary concept for television. It made an impact upon him because he replied that my proposal is "intriguing and monumental in scope and that it demands careful consideration . . . and the proposal would be turned over to the West Coast." I shall refrain from further boring the devout readers of this family journal except to conclude that the young fancy spokesman for the West Coast office with his inadequate mentality, brushed me off quickly over the phone in a voice touched with feline softness. When I reported this short colloquy to the vice president at the New York end it proved to no avail. The vice president's sentiments swiveled to the side of his California colleague. Thus the old school-tie prevailed.

Let us trust, nevertheless, that the editorial incompetents be replaced by those more sympathetic and objective toward the creative efforts of anyone justly acclaimed for his writing achievements beyond television.

Daring Plan to Keep TV Stanzas from Aging And Also Advance Sociability

By STIRLING SILLIPHANT

Hollywood.

There's something far more shocking than having a tv series cancelled out from under you.

That's having it renewed.

Stirling Silliphant

Lower that eyebrow, please. This kid's for real.

Every time you sell a series, you're signing away at least one year of your life, just as surely as though you'd signed aboard a clipper-ship in 1874 for a slant around the Horn.

If the series gets picked up for a second year, that's two you blew. And if you go three or more, well, mate, there goes one-tenth of your adult life, one-tenth of your own prime time.

Selling and working on a tv series is most nearly comparable to coming down with some virulent disease which isolates you from friend and family. You darn near die of it until, finally, it goes away, leaving you thin, shaken and just that much older.

Pat—that's my incredibly long-patient wife—and I have lost virtually all our friends since I became infected with the virus "Naked City" and its twin disease "Route 66." The dinners and parties we've been on the way to, but had to pass at the last minute, the appointments broken, the engagements necessarily refused, add up to more points than the current sky-high Dow-Jones industrial average. Because with a series some crisis is always forming around the next corner. Run, don't walk, to the nearest exigency.

In the days when I wrote pictures there was always time for people. But in television the only people I seem to have time for are the ones I write into my scripts.

The irony is that all this time still doesn't produce the kind of show you set out to do in the brave rush of serious intent and dedication. No matter how many hours you crowd into each day and night, you're still racing the clock, still having to shoot first drafts, still going with whatever director happens to be available that particular Wednesday when you must start, regardless of his qualification or lack of same for that particular script, still having to cast whatever actor is free that Friday at 3 p.m.

What's so incredible about tv is that any of it manages to be good under the conditions of its making, that out of so much haste and compromise, anything at all of quality and taste can emerge.

Just A Catchphrase

The accusation that the medium is a vast wasteland is just another of those egghead slogans so much in vogue in our slogan-motivated society, another dialectic jab without reference to the facts of the trouble.

Better to call tv the wonderland it is where miracles are performed every day by harassed writers, actors, directors, producers and technicians, all shooting from the hip—the most adroit collection of creative talent ever gathered into one community.

What is dreadful is not the work these people do, but the fact that their work could be better—and isn't—because of that one implacable enemy—that ole debbil time.

The way to better tv, obviously, is to eliminate the enemy—to take the time element and the pressure of "not how good, but how soon" out of the medium.

How?

Very simple. Also very revolutionary.

All you have to do is: limit the playing time of any single series to one season.

They only made 26 "Medics," but the show is remembered as a landmark. Sam Peckinpah did a superb series last season called "The Westerner." It only went 13 weeks, but it will survive in the minds of viewers far longer than some of the trash which seems to clutter up the set perpetually. Our original half-hour "Naked City" went only one season before we were unceremoniously booted off a network for being too "seamy" and "sick"—Madison Avenue for realistic.

Now that the hour-version of "Naked City" is in its second season (and "Route 66" ditto), I am constantly reminding my producer and partner, Herbert J. Leonard, that we're apparently doing something terribly wrong somewhere.

Obviously, if a show catches on with the public and makes points, the creator is failing to do his best work. He can only be spared from extending this failure season after season by an automatic cancellation after the first year.

We limit the number of terms any single citizen can serve as President of the United States, don't we?

Do you question the wisdom of our Founding Fathers?

So I say—one season per series. Finis.

Everybody Starts & Ends Even

Look what this will do. If the creators know they're only coming up to bat say 32 times, they're going to have to raise the standards of each of those 32 episodes. Their reputations, hence their income, is going to depend on how good the shows are, not how many points they earn in the ratings systems or how many seasons they perpetuate themselves.

This will instantly eliminate the need to scrounge for popular subjects and let the creator follow his creative instincts to produce, if he feels like it, unpopular stories.

In the fabric of drama and literature, the most artistic, the most significant works, have frequently been those appreciated by the fewest number of people, those intelligent and perceptive enough to coin slogans, for example.

How can tv ever hope to escape the brand of "wasteland" if it continues to be as popular as it is?

So, now we're clear on that first step, right? Just one season for everybody. Also that makes the tv jungle more competitive, because every year everybody starts all over again scampering for food.

My plan also eliminates the so-called "cycle" effect in tv.

There won't be time to "play it safe" or to copy somebody else. By the time he's on and you're not, he's off, and you certainly can't make it next year with his dead idea.

Another part of my plan to organize the time element in tv is to set inflexible deadlines for buying new shows, just as there are market weeks in the rag business—a time to order cruise wear, summer styles, winter fashions.

My suggestion is that we set New Season Week as the last week in January when all the buying for the coming Fall Season is done during one glamourous seven-day period in Hollywood.

And we do away with the filming of pilot shows, that elephant burial ground for millions down the drain. We simply introduce to the prospective buyer the producer, his writer, his cast, answer all questions simply and intelligently, then permit the buyer to read a typical script, plus a half-dozen extensive story treatments. All decisions are final. No merchandise can be returned or subsequently cancelled.

I appreciate this will work a terrible burden on the agency buyers. It assumes they must have as much foresight and intelligence as the producer himself who has to make the same kind of advance decision. It also assumes they know how to read, which, of course, terrifies me, because right here I can see the entire plan standing in frightful jeopardy.

By concentrating all buying decisions into the one week, the manufacturer, that is, the man who ultimately pays the whole tab, will already be saving a fortune inasmuch as agency and network biggies will only have to fly out to the Beverly Hills Hotel for one week a year instead of the many rush-rush panic or look-see flights now the comfortable and luxurious order of the day.

But look what it does for the poor harassed producer and writer. He now has five months to prepare scripts for a June shooting date, which in turn permits him to have his shows polished and at-maximum impact by fall air dates.

Now, there are additional elements in my plan. There's . . . I beg your pardon.

You want to talk to me—privately? Outside?

But—I don't know you. And it's dark out there. And . . .

HELP!

Liss, Jones in Europe For Sophia Loren TV'er

As the fourth in the NBC-TV "The World Of—" series, the life & times of Sophia Loren will get a full hour going-over by Don Hyatt's special projects unit. Producer-Director Gene Jones and writer Joe Liss are currently in Paris and move on to Rome and Naples, along with a film crew, for updated documentation of the Loren saga to be telecast Feb. 27.

This will follow the Jimmy Doolittle story, which gets an airing Jan. 18. Previously Bob Hope and Billy Graham were given the "World Of—" treatment.

SG Rolls With Four

Hollywood.

Screen Gems rolls four pilots during this month, three of them on location. They consist of three hourlong films, "Empire," Richard Egan starrer to be lensed in Santa Fe; "Defiance County," to be shot in Napa, and "APO 923," which will be filmed in Hawaii, and the half-hour comedy, "Archie," to be filmed here.

Among those testing for "Archie" is Eddie Shaw.

"THE ART OF DOCUMENT

On Tuesday, December 26, NBC gave Americans a comprehensive perspective on the Berlin crisis and the events leading up to it. The program was NBC White Paper No. 8: Khrushchev and Berlin, narrated by Chet Huntley. Irving Gitlin was Executive Producer and Fred Freed Producer-Director. ■ The next morning New York critics had this to say: "The perspective was sharp and clear...the art of documentary reached a height." (Jack Iams, Herald Tribune); "A pictorial triumph...if NBC White Papers achieve nothing else, they demand—and challenge—a viewer to become better informed about the world situation." (Kay Gardella, Daily News); "Once again the NBC News Department has shown how television journalism can play its part in awakening the country to the cruel realities of the world situation." (Jack Gould, N. Y. Times). ■ NBC White Paper climaxed a year in which NBC has sought to inform America of these realities, to make them meaningful, with the most comprehensive news coverage, the most responsible analysis in broadcast journalism. ■ It is a significant measure of success that more people watch the news on NBC than on any other network. ■ Among the many, wide-ranging major information specials to be presented by NBC News during the first three months of 1962 are: Our Man in Vienna (Jan. 24); NBC White Paper No. 9: The Battle of Newburgh (Jan. 28); Debutante '62 (Feb. 9); Loyal Opposition (Feb. 11); White Paper No. 10: Red China (Feb. 25); The Land (Mar. 13); and U. lerina Nora Kaye and Scott Douglas and in the musical comedy tradition Marge & Gower Champion. In the "pop" field, show-stopping accordionist Dick Contino, tapdancer Conrad Buckner, the Barry Sisters, Eddy Manson, illusionist Marvin Roy, American circus tightrope star Hubert Castle and for the Russian youngsters, the balloon act of The Shirleys and the hilarious platespinner Erich Brenn.

In our trips around the world and in our contacts with foreign performers who come to our stage, we have learned that people are people the world over. Russian audiences loved the American performers. Their applause was earshattering. Our 36 Russian musicians idolized our American conductor, Elliot Lawrence.

In Moscow, we gave nightly outdoor performances at Green Theatre in Gorky Park. It seated 10,000 but starting with our opening night we played to 14,000 Russians. One night I secured 40 tickets for some visitors from the American College of Surgeons. Just before intermission, I told the Russian audience, through my interpreter, that sitting with them were these American doctors, emphasizing that our surgeons were in Russia to confer with Russian surgeons, for the benefit of all.

Russians are deeply emotional people and, when they heard this, it touched off a cheering demonstration that ever will be unforgettable. Each Russian family that attends a show brings along a small bouquet of flowers. At the end of an act, if they have enjoyed it deeply, a youngster representing the family walks right up on the stage and presents the flowers to the artist. On this night, unable to reach the American surgeons the Russians threw these bouquets of flowers through the air at them. None of us had ever witnessed such a delighted turmoil.

Leningrad, because of its fantastically heroic defense of the city against the Nazis, occupies a special niche in the annals of Russian heroism. Opening one performance, tapdancing Conrad Buckner badly hurt himself in a prodigious leap from an elevation, climaxing in a sliding "split." His left heel apparently hit a board in the stage floor which was slightly higher than the rest. Two Russian women doctors, who were in the audience, rushed backstage, phoned for an ambulance and speeded him to a Leningrad hospital.

When they brought him back to the theatre, young Buckner was on crutches but he insisted that he would appear in the finale, which was built around Rise Stevens' "Getting to Know You," in Russian. At a certain musical cue, our entire cast joined her on stage, one half of the line of stars lifting small Russian flags above their heads and the other half of the line of stars lifting small American flags over their heads. As Miss Stevens sang her last note, I'd reveal a small Russian and a small American flag and cross the staffs of them, so that the flags were flying together.

This always exploded a storm of applause, indicating the true feeling of the people of Russia, as contrasted to their Commie leaders.

On this particular night, because Buckner was standing on crutches, in the finale, I told the people of this city noted for heroism, pointing to Buckner, how deeply we appreciated the concern of the two Russian women doctors and how grateful all of us were for the expert care he had received in the hospital. And then I added:

"I told Conrad not to come out in this finale but he said to me: 'One does not come to Leningrad —to surrender'."

Bedlam broke loose in the audience. Gower Champion told me later that even our performers were misty-eyed as they saw the Leningrad audience go wild. As the storm of applause died down, again through my interpreter I said to the audience:

"Because of the heroism of your city of Leningrad and because I have been told that each family in this city lost at least one man in the war, I'm certain that there is not a mother in Leningrad—just as there is not a mother in the United States—who ever again wants to send her husband or her son to war." Pandemonium broke loose. The audience surged forward to the orchestra pit. They threw

East Vs. West Coast Union Strife; 3,000 Miles Yet Worlds Apart

By ART WOODSTONE

There is reason to assume, sometimes, that New York and Hollywood are not only in different countries but are small nations at war who bomb each other by mass media and reach occasional truces by Boeing 707 Jet.

New Yorker David Susskind may still not like Hollywood, but the mistrust the east has for the west—and visa versa—is evidenced more acutely in the attitudes and acts of organized labor. Indeed, some of the most graphic pages in the history of television are about the nearly cataclysmic differences between the Hollywood-oriented union and the New York-oriented union.

Most other unions can keep their internecine strife a secret to all but the most enterprising reporters and the management of AFL-CIO. Not so in television. The reason differences in television unionism have been so easy to detect is largely because this is show business, not the electrical business, the automotive business or even the trucking business. Show business is the world of talent, and talent, as everyone knows, assumes the right to speak out, and, when it speaks, to speak histrionically—doubtless stimulated by the same deep passions that made it turn to acting, writing or directing in the first place.

Today, the members of Screen Actors Guild and the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists only have the kindest public words for each other. But once upon a not too distant time, the AFTRA crew in New York looked upon those screen actors on the Coast as "the country club set." SAG looked on the boys in New York as "hungry commercial announcers, not actors."

There is truth to both remarks, just enough truth to have singed each union in turn. Distrust has not completely disappeared, but has been hidden because the two unions believe there is a greater good for organized acting in tv if partisanship can be muted.

One Union, Two Philosophies

The calm on one front does not mean that the war of the coasts has ended. Even today, there is grave dissension in the ranks of not two competing unions but one union—the Directors Guild of America.

Believing that the Director's Guild is run by the same breed of film-oriented, 40-hour week, Malibu and BevHills boys that have found a home in SAG, many of the union's little fellows in New York are smarting. But the pain is not due to a genuine social cleavage of poor man and rich man, but to conflict that seems due more to the mutual ability to understand or to face the problems peculiar to these

Television: The Pimple Of The Performing Arts

By GERALD F. LIEBERMAN

It thundered onto the American scene, this thing called television. Suckled on the breast of the moving picture industry, it gobbled up its reluctant mother, then mangled its kin; radio, the nightclub field, and the last remnants of vaudeville and the legitimate theatre. As it plunged forward it dealt a near fatal blow to the reading habit of America; such as it was; and when it had wrought its carnage it stood up before us and we saw that it needed a diaper change.

How does it happen that an infant able to eat those who gave it life should inherit only the foppish qualities of its creators? The answer is simple. It conquered only the conquerable, the weakest element of civilized social order. Art and knowledge, always vulnerable to marauders, was easily victimized by television. But when it came up against the powerhouses of realism—economics, polities, and moral folkways—television defaulted, and turned instead to fling challenges at the corpse of idealism already rotting in the road.

For all its vulnerability idealism always has been and always will be the greatest threat to the realists, so with the approval of its co-conspirators, the hatchetmen of economics moved in on the infant television; and after stunting its growth it proceeded to brainwash the child. Now the pattern was set, for the economist has always been the handmaiden of the politician, who in turn is the servant of the professional moralist, who in its turn is generally a professional freeloader and always has been.

Ministry of Fear

Today television is a ministry of fear, the mecca of the petrified practitioners of the art of subservience. This generally applies to the ushers, the executives, and the so-called creative minds in between. The only courage in anything connected with the medium is found among the stagehands.

Television is the loudest exponent of its maturity, an egotist thoroughly blind to its own ignorance, and it offers growth statistics which on the surface substantiates the claim. But its growth is like that of Lenny in Steinbeck's "Of Mice and Men"; for all its muscle and power it remains a characteristic imbecile.

Television people roar their challenge at the slightest hint that it is infantile. Yet its behavior shows nothing else. It is easily frightened, subject to tantrums, eager to take the lollipop offered it by economic big brother when it has been a good little boy and done what it was told to do. And for all its claims to adulthood it clings to the childish habit of playing games with itself; of making believe it is something it is not, the way children bestow rank when they play soldier: "I'll let you be a Colonel if you let me be a General."

In this same way television awards title and rank to people which in no way indicates their true function.

This not only applies to individuals and groups but to proclamations.

So we find within television and its entourage talent agencies that know nothing of talent, assistants who are hindrances, associates with whom nobody will associate, producers who are destroyers, and a code of good practices, which, rather than establish good practices establishes the boundaries of the strained limits to which it estimates bad practices will be tolerated.

In creating these misnomers there is self-justification, for nothing can be expected to nurture the seeds of its own destruction, and truth, always a destroyer of fancy, would be most destructive in television. Were it not so, were truth to be applied, we would find titles such as Head Smiling Boy, Vice President in Charge of Sponsor Appeasement, Associate Personality Kid, Coordinator of Tantrums, Assistant Parasite. And television stations would be awarded the Seal of Obedience.

A good set of teeth does not a stirring performance make, nor do good ideas flow from the brainless putty mass into which God has carved a pleasant smile, and good manuscripts cannot be found in the pockets of Ivy League suits—the pants are too tight.

'Boring' From Within

That the profusion of gutless wonders who permeate television likes things as they are is the reason for the medium's constant search to find now ways to bore us. If, by some chance, they were released from the bond of conformity in which they are snuggled they would make fools of themselves. They would have to produce, and their ineptitude would show, so they cling to the status quo. The television industry is like the new born babe, which, once freed, immediately resumes the curled position of incubation.

There have been, and we can only hope there will be with greater frequency, dissenters within. But, when on those rare occasions, a David Susskind takes the lead or a Jack Paar takes a walk (whether it be out the studio door, or up to the line of demarcation separating West from East Berlin) there is chaos. Then, with the cunning of a female cat, television selectmen regain their high pitched voices and draw attention to the tripe Susskind has produced, and they pass the dirty word that he, Susskind, has taken the last bite out of the caviar can that fed him.

As for Paar, they insidiously leak stories which have nothing to do with the matter at hand, condemning him for past happenings in which they had previously defended him. They say he was always hard to handle and in need of constant supervision, they never know when he might dwell on some unmentionable subject, like tile palaces. Yet they themselves talk of nothing else, for the upholstered throne room has become the symbol of their status-conscious world.

What can be done? I, for one, see little hope of it ever being what it might have been and I think we should give up on it, concentrate our efforts elsewhere. I think the areas victimized by television can draw encouragement from the publishing field.

When television drove away the million-copy bestseller the publishers came up with a lot of lesser sellers and their own paperback revolution. Things began to happen. If the phenomenal million-copy seller is gone it is replaced by the equally phenomenal $10 bestseller, and the $1.95 paperback. But publishing has not concentrated all its efforts here, nor has it ceased to offer more than has ever been offered before for as little as 25c.

Movies have struck back by making the product they have sold to television look sick when compared to what they are offering in the movie houses.

I think nightclubs can do the same thing, but first they must concentrate on better food at lower prices, and they must experiment with their floorshows.

The legitimate theatre can survive if it would stop concentrating on the big ticket and follow closely the happenings in the book trade. Am afraid vaudeville was already dead, but there is some hope that stirring signs of fortitude might once more make virile the denatured father of television, radio.

And don't forget pay television.

When all this has happened we may suddenly look behind and see the terrible infant coming on fast with a display of courageous idealism that makes the restimulated areas of the performing arts appear to be on a treadmill. By then television will have nothing to lose for it will have been abandoned by economic big brother in the same way economic big brother has always abandoned things that were no longer useful to it. Like the railroads—but that's another story.

The Year TV Took the Fifth

people. And this is completely true. Under the U. S. system of television broadcasting the air is unquestionably free. It costs the individual absolutely nothing to view thousands of hours of broadcasting. If he likes none of it, he may, according to our Constitution, turn it off. Programs that enough people turn off automatically cease to exist. Every night, at millions of television knobs, tens of millions of Americans vote for what they want to see and what they don't want to see.

Qualitatively what they have to vote for could be improved by reducing the quantity of it. This would do two things. It would cut down the number of outlets for creative experimentation, thus further limiting the area for creativity for the very limited creative talent in tv. And it would thus further reduce a citizen's scope of selection of things to see.

Those who suggest that the quality level of material might be raised by toll television, suggest that the additional money toll-tv promises a man will attract better creative talent than commercial tv now buy. This supposes that because a man makes more money he will automatically create better material. It doesn't work out that way. But it would work out that way if toll-tv charged for what's on the air, the air would cease to be free.

Those who suggest regulatory bodies with broad powers to police what is broadcast are courting censorship and asking for officials to do what the people themselves can do better because there are more of them.

At the present time the free air of the United States is being protected by the law of personal preference. That which the citizens do not want, they do not watch. That which is advertised and offends, they will not buy. It may be a slow process but it's a certain one.

That which is instructive and cultural will be found and watched by those seeking instruction and culture. These people have no right to demand that their neighbors sacrifice the entertainment they enjoy and, perhaps, need. Because no matter how much cultural and educational material is broadcast, people will not look at it unless they are interested in it. This has been repeatedly proved.

For this reason control of the television channels rests, and must always rest, in the hands of the citizens of the United States.

erns back." Minow didn't answer, but just stared at the phone in horror. Freddie's voice came through again, "And don't look for a plane. I've also built a launching pad."

Minow recovered. "But how could an intelligent young man like you want Westerns back on television?

"Because I'm a young boy with no outlets," answered Freddie, "and when I see a Western hero I associate with him for 29-and-a-half minutes, minus commercials. It relieves my aggressions."

"Please don't force me to do this," pleaded Mr. Minow.

"You'll do it or else," growled Freddie.

Mr. Minow sighed and his shoulders slumped. "All right," he muttered, "I'll call Sonny Werblin and Abe Lastfogel. I know in this crisis they'll come through with the type of programs I hate."

In two weeks everything the critics liked to rip was back on the air, and one morning soon after, a mushroom cloud rose over an isolated area of the Pacific. It was thought that Russia had tested again, but Mr. Minow sighed with relief. He knew that Freddie had dumped his bomb

'All the world's a stage', said a noted English playwright. And four centuries later, BBC Television adds some startling dimensions to these words.

Today—BBC tv is engaged in a programme of co-production with important, world-wide film and television organisations. It is a plan involving a far-reaching exchange of ideas, talent and facilities. And the result will be more television entertainment with an exciting international flavour.

A number of these co-produced series are already in front of the cameras. The Third Man (2nd Series) and Zero One are just two of many to come. Watch for them!

If You Think It's Fun To Diversify, Just Try It

By ARTHUR CHRISTIANSEN

London.

If Britain's Pilkington Committee, due to report this year on the future of television and radio, were to recommend that the whole thing be renationalized—which is unthinkable—the commercial tv companies would still be in a position to make good profits.

Even the pessimists concede that the worst that can happen is the retention of the jolly old status quo with all its stupidities and anachronisms, and it is hard to see how it can be otherwise with so much capital locked up and so many people employed in making product.

But let us be even gloomier and what do we find? Diversification.

ATV, my favorite London company (the one that employs me) is in piped tv and radio rentals, 10-pin bowling alleys, long-playing gramophones, canned office music and God knows what else. A-R owns the 100,000 capacity Wembley Stadium. Sidney Bernstein of Granada bought McGibbon & Kee, a prosperous book publishing business, and claims that as a cinema chain they actually diversified when they went into TV!

But this is a personal column, so let's get down to people. Or more precisely, me.

With everybody doin' what don't come naturally, I thought to myself, "Christiansen, it it's good for the big battalions it must be good for you, too."

So in 1961 I diversified. I wrote articles on journalism for the Left Wing weekly New Statesman. I published my life with Lord Beaverbrook under the title Headlines All My Life. I became an actor and played the part of myself in a sci-fi movie thriller, "The Day the Earth Caught Fire." I took part in B.B.C. radio programs and made the occasional tv appearance on both ITV and BBC as a newspaper pundit. I became a director of a local radio station in Essex. For ATV I helped with documentaries, officiated at the birth of my brainchild—a Sunday afternoon tv newspaper—among other things.

And I now go on record with the view that diversifying is damned hard work that brought high tax rewards to the British Treasury and wheezes on the bronchial tubes of the Christiansen family breadwinner. For a quiet time give me an editorship on one of Lord Beaverbrook's papers any day.

Some odd situations also developed. F'instance . . .

I found myself employed by two Vals simultaneously—Val Parnell, boss of ATV and Val Guest, the movie producer. One day an advertising character telephoned to say that Val had agreed to pose in a newly-marketed raincoat and would I do so, too? No fees; just a free raincoat and maybe one for th Missus, too—but good publicity for one and all.

Sure, I said; and as I was working for Parnell at that time I asked Sheila Dyett, his secretary, when the pix were going to be taken. Nothing doing, said Sheila, and I went on my way somewhat puzzled as the other Val was not in my mind that day. Nor did I doubt Sheila's word as I couldn't see Val Parnell with his £80,000 a year from ATV being exactly attracted any more than I was by the chance of posing with me in return for a free raincoat.

Then Val Guest 'phoned and all became clear. I was to be billed in the ad as one of the stars of "The Day the Earth Caught Fire" and thus the movie would get a national advertising campaign for free. Okay. Okay. I caught on.

Then "The Day the Earth Caught Fire" got me into trade union difficulties. In order to play the part of the newspaper editor in the movie I joined British Actors Equity. I paid my £30 entrance fee as a probationary member in April, unaware that by October Equity would be locked in mortal combat with the commercial tv companies. So here I was, under contract to ATV as its editorial adviser and in dispute with ATV as an actor who might possibly be cast as the editor of the Fleet Street series "Deadline Midnight!"

I prophesy that despite my appearance in it "The Day the Earth Caught Fire" is going to be fine boxoffice in the U.S. and all over the world as well as in Britain. It is the story of the accidental simultaneous explosion of two nuclear experiments by the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. which throws the world out of axis and out of orbit. London and New York first get typhoon weather, then Artic conditions, while the Esquimox sweat it out and so on.

With the Berlin crisis and Khrushchev letting off 50-megaton bombs and the U.S. firing hundreds of thousands of needles into the stratosphere, the script gets more topical every day.

Spotlight On Judd

In fact it has got an "X" Certificate in Britain while "On the Beach" made when the international situation was calmer, got an "A."

Watch out for a newcomer who will go places—Edward Judd, playing the part of one of my reporters. On the set I got on well with everyone except Judd. Once when I fluffed my lines he suggested I should write them on the inside of my hand, to which I replied that I would prefer to inscribe them on his backside. But we made it up as I had much sympathy for him playing alongside an amateur. Having seen the movie two or three times I feel in my critical bones that poor Judd ain't dead but very much alive.

My reminiscenes are to be published by Harper's Jan. 17 in New York so I may be in the U.S. around that day. Same title as in the U.K., and according to the advance blurb, which says I am cynical, selling at around $5. If any actor wants to pay me out by becoming a journalist here's his chance!

I wrote three special chapters for the U.S. version including one called "Thunder from the Waldorf Towers," an account of Lord Beaverbrook's attitude to the Americans which puzzles many people, but Harpers decided to stick to the British version.

One quote might amuse VARIETY's showbiz readers:—

Beaverbrook: Vivien Leigh will be damaged by going abroad with her ex-husband on holiday."

Myself: "I don't think so. Nothing damages actors and actresses. Indiscretions merely attract the public in a greater degree to the boxoffice."

Beaverbrook (to a guest): "There you have a whole of the Daily Express in one sentence."

But if I were asked to review the book, I would confess that if I could do it all over again it would be much better. (So would my performance as an actor—can you hear me, Hitch?)

On tv my "Sunday Newspaper of the Air" idea eventually got airborne after 18 months, under the title, "The Time, the Place and the Camera."

It started off as the Sunday Globe, but after several changes Val Parnell dreamed up the final one while sunning himself on the Riviera. I liked it because it was the longest title that could possibly be devised, whereas all the British tv shows nowadays have one-worders like Tempo, Monitor, Tonight, etc. (If you can't be short, be long!)

But the biggest tv story of the year has not reached print till now. Lunching with Max Aitken, Lord Beaverbrook's son and Chairman of Beaverbrook Newspapers, I told him some of the rich anecdotage that surrounds Val Parnell and Lew Grade, ATV's bosses.

Max was fascinated and invited me to bring them to dine with him at the Daily Express office. For those who do not know of the remorseless campaign that Beaverbrook's papers have conducted year in year out against commercial tv this news will not seem sensational.

But, believe me, it is as though Khrushchev was invited to call on Pope John in Rome.

Max, Val and Lew got on famously, and after dinner the four of us toured the building while the paper was being printed.

To my astonishment Val admitted that he had never seen a paper put to press before, nor had Lew. They were as pleased as a couple of schoolboys when their names were set into type on a linotype machine. And Lew admitted that running a tv station was a child's play by comparison with publishing a newspaper.

There ought to be a moral to all this, but I regret to say that at the time of writing the Beaverbrook newspapers are still banging away at commercial tv. I suppose that the good propagandist must be patient, so I will let you know how things are going in the next birthday issue of VARIETY in 1963!

of the budgets now. Nobody can experiment, nobody can take chances. You were a staff-writer at KNX in the '30s, you know how simple it was to get going with some project which it didn't matter if it turned out to be no winner."

The Coast Technique

"Allen was in town the other day," I said. Allen was an old-line writer for broadcasting too and now heads one of the big Coast agencies. My friend's look asked what this had to do with what he'd been saying. "He had to come to New York to see about some squabble with one of the agency's clients," I explained. "The thing is, this client had been kicking about their show. Well, after Allen told me what the row was all about I said, 'What's the matter with you? You say you can't find a new idea for the client. Call up two or three good writers, get them down to your office, have them put their feet up and within an hour you'll have a new idea and a good one. Does tv now have a rule against doing things that way?' 'Yes,' Allen told me, 'yes, tv now has a rule against doing things that way. Or at any rate our agency does in the case of a budget the size of this client's. What I now do when I have to look for a new show, I saunter over to one of the independent film-outfits and ask What have you got for X dollars? They then play for me what they've got and I either pick something there or go to another outfit. You see there's so much dough involved our agency will no longer take the responsibility of dreaming up a show.'"

"So why are you arguing with me?" my friend wanted to know.

"Oh, I don't know," I said. "Habit. I was pretty shocked at Allen's revelation of the inside story. And I couldn't help thinking of the way shows such as 'Mayor of the Town' and 'The Whistler' and 'I Was There' were started at costs not to exceed $1,000 apiece."

"Okay, there you are," my friend said. "There was more artistic satisfaction—think of all the good sustainers the networks ran, for instance the old CBS Radio Workshop."

"Yes," I conceded. "That was some show."

"Is there anything like it on the air now?"

Next day he called me up to say, "Hey, you've been analyzed. What does it mean when you dream about a shoestring?" I asked if he had dreamed about a shoestring. "Of course," he said irritably. "What do you think I meant? When I woke up I remembered I dreamed of standing there, a violin in my hand and with a big orchestra at my back, and though you know I can't play anything I was making some good music come out of that violin, even though," and his voice took on a puzzled note, "it was strung only with one shoestring."

"It means you hate your father," I said. "Tell me, where were you playing. At the funeral they didn't bother to hold for Radio drama?"

kisses to the Americans on stage and they threw flowers. Women were weeping and dabbing their eyes with handkercheifs. Some of them threw their arms around Elliot Lawrence. Others patted him on the back. These are the moments that you never forget.

Satchmo

In West Germany, where we went to entertain our troops, Mrs. Sullivan and I took Louis Armstrong and his wife to dinner one night. After dinner, before going back to the Berlin Hilton Hotel where we all were living, we stopped in at the carnival grounds where they were holding the "Oktoberfest." It was near midnight and only a handful were in the carnival area. Suddenly, crowds of people started gathering. First they came by 2's, then by 4's, then in squadrons. The magic word had gone out that Satchmo had arrived and within 15 minutes, the crowds multiplied to such a fantastic extent that they sent in an emergency call for additional police. All they wanted to do was to look at Armstrong or touch him.

So, you can imagine the job that Louis Armstrong has done for America, all over the world, as a roving ambassador. I've never seen anyone handle crowds so easily as Satchmo. And he never loses that wonderful smile.

In Spoleto, Italy, when we went there a few years ago to do a show woven about Gian Carlo-Menotti, I persuaded Armstrong's manager and friend, Joe Glaser, to have Armstrong and his band join us over there. "But he's dead tired, Ed," said Glaser.

However, Satchmo decided to go and it was on that occasion that he almost died. It's a long drive from the airport at Rome through the mountainous country that leads to Spoleto and it was blazing hot.

At 5 a.m. the next morning Menotti was roused from sleep by one of his household servants. "Mr. Armstrong is dying—he's gasping for breath," the frightened servant told the composer.

Menotti, in that emergency, indicated the stuff of which he is made. It was he who summoned the ambulance—it was he who ordered oxygen tanks from an adjoining town—it was Menotti who alerted the Spoleto Hospital that Armstrong soon would be there and was in desperate condition. Dr. Schiff, who travels with Armstrong, says that he will never forget the professional speed with which Menotti made all of these arrangements. Dr. Schiff, of course, could not speak Italian so Menotti proved a God-send.

"I'll be all right, Pops," whispered Armstrong to me as I helped stretcher-bearers lift him into the small ambulance. The walls of his hospital room were almost covered with cablegrams from all over the world—stars, statesmen, G.I.'s he had entertained. It was an outpouring of affection such as you rarely witness. For 48 hours, it was touch-and-go.

News services and Italian newspapermen established a "death watch" on the ground floor of the hospital. Never before or since has the cable office at Spoleto handled such a volume of newspaper stories. All over the world, people wanted to know how Armstrong was getting along.

Our producer, Bob Precht, went to Eileen Farrell, who was there to sing in one of Menotti's operas. "Eileen" he said, "how about you singing with Satchmo's band?" Eileen and her managers, Ruth O'Neill and Bill Judd, agreed instantly, and Eileen was nothing short of sensational. A few years later, on one of our shows, from Las Vegas, I had Eileen and Armstrong sing a duet in commemoration of those grim days and nights at Spoleto.

These were some of the thoughts that were going through my mind, on a recent night when Stanley Burke, then president of the UN Correspondents' Association, graciously introduced me at a glittering affair.

The Hotel Pierre ballroom was draped with the flags of all the UN member-nations.

On the dais were the President of the General Assembly, Monji Slim; U-Thant, who succeeded the late Dag Hammarskjold; our Ambassador to the UN, Adlai Stevenson; Russia's Valerian Zorin; Armand Berard of France; Sir Patrick Bean of England; India's C. S. Jha; China's Dr. Tingfu Tsiange; Tunisia's Habib Bourguiba; Ghana's Alex Quaison Sackey and all the other UN ambassadors.

UN of Show Biz

At the tables in the ballroom were members of UN delegations and celebrated personages such as Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. At the tables, too, were UN correspondents from nearly every country on the globe.

Burke, in his intro, told the assembled UN ambassadors that our tv show qualified as a special UN ambassador—"because Ed Sullivan brought to his tv stage performers from nearly every country in Europe and Asia—and has traveled all over the world to bring back to United States and Canadian audiences representations of the artistic cultures of so many UN nations."

As he introduced me, my mind housed a lot of flashbacks: the Eskimos in our audience at desolate Kotzibue, on the Alaskan shore of the Bering Straits, when we did a show for the GI's on the first stage ever erected above the Arctic Circle; the misty day at Ireland's Blarney Castle, when our cameras and sound equipment were carried up the winding and slippery Castle steps to the top deck, where, scared to death, I leaned backwards to kiss the Blarney Stone, fearful all through it that I was going to slide from the grip of the Irish caretaker; the days when we were filming the wonderful Philippine Dancers at the Brussels World's Fair; the day previous, when we filmed the battlefield of Waterloo, not many miles from Brussels, and the interior of the very house where Napoleon slept the night before Wellington overthrew him.

It was a montage of memories of experiences in Israel, Germany, Austria, Italy, Japan, Honolulu, England, France and Cuba.

Castro

In Cuba the night before Castro reached Havana, I laped an interview with him at the small town of Matanzas.

"Many Americans fear that you are backed by Communists, Fidel," I told him. Castro pointed to his bearded soldiers.

"Around their necks," said Castro "they are wearing scapulars. They have religious medals pinned to their uniforms. How could they be Communists? I, too, went to Catholic schools. How could I be a Communist?"

There were other thoughts that crowded through my mind: taping a show with Maurice Chevalier at Estoril, just outside of Lisbon; taping a show in Cirque d'Hiver, famous Paris circus, with Burt Lancaster, Gina Lollobrigida and Tony Curtis; taping a show with Gregory Peck in England and recently taping a comedy excerpt outside of London with Bing Crosby and Bob Hope; taping an excerpt with Kirk Douglas in Munich; taping Israeli dancers and singers, around an army campfire, outside of Tel Aviv; taping Brigitte Bardot in Paris on two occasions; taping Marlon Brando, Glenn Ford, the late Louis Calhern, Eddie Albert and Paul Ford in Japan; riding with Charlton Heston in his chariot, as he circled the stadium in Rome; taping excerpts of shows in Italy, with Clark Gable, Sophia Loren, Anna Magnani, Gina Lollobrigida; filming a show in Lisbon, with Maurice Chevalier.

And always learning that people are people, the world over. Miss Bardot and Brando are supposed to be difficult to get along with, I always found them to be delightful human beings.

The oddly amusing thing about all this is that I never had the vaguest idea I'd ever be part of showbusiness. I started out as a sports writer and I still spend more time reading the sports pages than I do the television pages. Nobody in our family has ever been in showbusiness. In the Sullivan clan, there have been lawyers, priests, civil engineers, and my brother is in the construction industry, but not a single entry in showbusiness. It was a series of complete accidents that precipitated me into show business.

Global TV Horizons

programs have been screened in 20 countries—a striking success all the way from children's puppet shows like "Supercar" to really star-studded adventure serials like "The Four Just Men."

And the days are over now when only New York could afford to fly in stars from all over the world for their network shows. We fly the top names across the Atlantic regularly for "Sunday Night at the London Palladium"—and lately we have recorded Britain's first big series made with a top American star, Jo Stafford, at our new $12,600,000 studio centre at Borehamwood, Hartfordshire.

Where do we go from here?

Global Color TV Inevitable

Well, we know that international trade in tv can do nothing but grow. All over the world tv is expanding. In Britain we believe that an extension of our tv time to absolute freedom cannot be delayed indefinitely. And inside a few years, the exchange of programs in color is inevitable.

How are the world's networks going to cope, how are they going to keep on pushing up their standards, spending more money for better programs, unless a quality world market is built up?

It is true that in ATV we have rightly become more choosy about the shows we buy from abroad. More and more it is becoming obvious that one country will only buy the best from another.

Today we are not only planning to export our light entertainment, but our drama—the biggest output in British television—and documentaries. Already we have exchanged programs with Soviet Russia, already our backroom boys are looking ahead to the age of Space TV, when live programs will be bounced around the world via satellites.

We know that it will not be all that long before items will be linked live from New York, Tokyo or Moscow direct into our current affairs programs like "The Time, The Place—And the Camera."

So it is inevitable that over the next few years television will become even more international.

How do we use it to reflect life in the different countries as well as contributing top entertainment on a worldwide "network?"

Well, we in ATV have already pioneered a form of drama documentary designed to inform as well as entertain. Twice weekly for four and a half years we have screened "Emergency—Ward 10," a serial about everyday life in a British hospital.

"Deadline Midnight" reflects a true picture of life in a big Fleet Street newspaper office. "Harpers West One" tackles life in a big store. "Call Oxbridge 2000" deals with the life of a young doctor in general practice.

Tremendous care is taken to give these locations and characters and the stories around them an absolutely authentic air. We know from the ratings that they have enormous appeal—and we believe that they are the kind of programs which could do a great deal to help people overseas understand Britain, its citizens and its institutions.

World Education & Culture

We shall take our place, too, as a contributor to world education and culture once the tv net is flung wider. The series of French lessons we made actually in France could be usefully screened in any English-speaking country. The same goes for the several series we have created about art—more recently "Five Revolutionary Painters" and "Landscape Into Art"—conducted by Sir Kenneth Clark, the eminent British authority on art.

And we would like to show the world a glimpse of some of the outstanding lecture series given by Alan Taylor, the Oxford historian, on "The First World War" and "Prime Ministers of England."

We have been in business only six years. There is a long way to go, there are countless problems before us as we look forward, with VARIETY, to the expanding world of show business.

But there is also a great challenge to meet. As a young company, ATV salutes the more venerable VARIETY—certain that both of us are on the brink of the most exciting chapter in the history of show business.

'TV' sounds simple; deceptively simple. 'Associated-Rediffusion' sounds much more complex; and it is. Set out to give the best of television to the vast family of Londoners, with all their various tastes—and often to all of Britain as well—and you quickly have a very complex pattern of programmes. The Big Top, and the pick of the pops; drama and comedy; plays, films, musicals; music itself, for imagining, remembering—or forgetting; streamlined series like 'Echo Four-Two'; human documents, like the programmes of Daniel Farson; panel games and variety; national and world affairs in 'This Week'. That's not all, but it's enough to show that 'Take Your Pick' is more than a very popular show—it's just what Associated-Rediffusion likes people to do. Which (not surprisingly) is why over nine million Londoners do it.

East Vs. West

two separate worlds within a world.

The Directors Guild is the outcome of a recent merger of the old directors unit in Hollywood with the newer, smaller Radio & Television Directors Guild in New York. Trained in royal fashion by Cecil B. DeMille and directors of that ilk, the Hollywood group at once imposed a very large initiation fee on all rookies of the two-coast union, a fee that some lesser figures, like associate directors, still cry over. Then, because nearly everything DGA does in Hollywood is freelance, where the concept works well, the powers in Hollywood imposed freelancing on some New York staff men, and, without going into any detail, suffice to say that these New Yorkers now stand to lose money or, worse, their jobs.

Lack of Unity

There is no unity of directors now really. In order for Hollywood to "accept" RTDG, it decided to reject a small New York group of film directors who come under the banner of the Screen Directors International Guild. Pulling out of merger negotiations with SDIG is said, in part, to have been prompted by a faint aura of "jealousy" about the very existence of film directors in the unimportant world outside the proper Beverly Hills orbit. Naturally, this division between SDIG and DGA can lead to even more trouble than the divisions cropping up within the latter union itself between its country club set and the "poor working slob."

So mistrustful is Hollywood of New York that Screen Actors Guild, based mainly in Hollywood, rejected an opportunity for out-and-out merger with the American Federation of Television & Radio Artists, headquartered in New York. And this despite the advice of a highly-paid labor consultant, hired jointly by both unions, who recommended merger. Today, SAG and AFTRA have a working agreement, however, that seems to work fairly well in avoiding the jurisdictional squabbles that just two years ago were tearing deeply into the fabric of both actor guilds.

British TV

has stated its case for its second channel and extension of radio services. On the introduction of color, however, it has been making a lot of noise in public as its experimental service has been running successfully for some years, and it has been inhibited by the Government's persistent refusal to give the signal until the Pilkington report is published. At the Corporation's new Television Centre there is a duplicate transmitting gallery waiting for the word "off" to start its second service. That is the measure of the BBC's confidence.

In the course of its 12 months inquiry, the Pilkington Committee has taken written and oral evidence from thousands of organizations. Everyone and his brother wanted to get in on the act. Television, radio, press, advertising, motion picture and legit groups were interviewed as they have vested interests to protect. But there were also documents from churches, schools, local authorities, welfare organizations — almost everyone who wanted to comment on the potential influence of television and radio for good or bad. This volume of evidence makes it a gigantic labor of love for the Committee and there is always the danger that they may have labored in vain.

Not to be forgotten is the fate of the Beveridge report in 1952. With only one dissentient, it came out strongly against the introduction of any form of commercial tv or radio. There was a minority report signed only by Selwyn Lloyd, now Chancellor of Exchequer, in favor of commercial tv. It was that minority report which was accepted by the Government and provided the framework for the legislation which came into effect in 1954.

VARIETY-ARB SYNDICATION CHART

VARIETY's weekly tabulation based on ratings furnished by American Research Bureau, highlights the top ten network shows on a local level and offers a rating study in depth of the top ten syndicated shows in the same particular markets. This week five different markets are covered.

In the syndicated program listings of the top ten shows, rating data such as the average share of audience, coupled with data as to time and day of telecasting competitive programming in the particular slot, etc., is furnished. Reason for detailing an exact picture of the rating performance of syndicated shows is to reflect the true rating strength of particular series. Various branches of the industry, ranging from media buyers to local stations and/or advertisers to syndicators will find the charts valuable.

Over the course of a year, ARB will tabulate a minimum of 247 markets. The results of that tabulation will be found weekly in VARIETY. Coupled with the rating performance of the top ten network shows on the local level, the VARIETY-ARB charts are designed to reflect the rating tastes of virtually every tv market in the U. S.

(*) ARB's October 1961 survey covered a multi-week period. Syndicated shows sharing one of the weeks with an alternating or special program are listed, with the multi-week rating of all programs in the time period given.

Four Freedoms

believe that minorities can be turned into majorities. Opera, ballet, the arts, current affairs, we deal with them all at times when the maximum potential audience is there. Take music. We do not accept the view that concerts cannot be done on television. Every fortnight for the last three years, for about eight months of the year, we have had an audience for fine orchestras with great soloists equal to 500 times the capacity of the largest concert hall in Europe. In opera we have a regular policy which aims, at least, at one full length opera a month. Television ballet has developed with us to the point where even the most conservative, as well as the finest ballet in Europe, that of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, has signed a contract with the BBC to produce three ballets a year for three years on television, and it was a splendid sight in the gallery of a studio at Television Centre not long ago, to see the famous choreographer Dame Ninette de Valois sitting alongside our producer rehearsing "The Rake's Progress."

It seems inescapable that our rivals must adopt a style of programming designed to attract the largest, steadiest, most predictable audience so that their advertisers will have confidence in them. But with us it is possible to put the "customer," not the stockholder or the advertiser, first all the time. We make mistakes, of course. We have our failures and our flops. Sometimes we underestimate the audience; sometime we overestimate it. But at least we can see that audience not as a mass, but as individuals with diverse needs and interests, all of which, not just some time or other, but at the time most suitable and convenient for them, we want to serve.

Among social historians there seem to be two schools of thought about the BBC. One is that it was the last fling, the final explosion of Victorian paternalism. The other that it was the prototype and model of a new administrative form. There may be truth in both theories, the important thing, we feel who work in it today, is that our past provides us with a sense of purpose, and that our present forbids us to be prigs. We do not see, as some do, public and provider glaring at each other over a Berlin Wall, but as friends in an alliance with mutual and enlarging rewards.

German TV

should try to know and understand our neighbors."

So a new television series here is titled "The Power of Belief." It plans to investigate, explain, show every major religion of the world. One feature on Mohammedism, another on Buddhism, Christianity, Judaism, all will be dealt with by a team of German photographers and reporters who have traveled throughout the world for a year to prepare these shows.

Currently, there are close to a million Italian and Greek workers employed in West Germany to help out with the acute labor shortage here. And the West German television recently announced that it will occasionally show an Italian-language program, especially for these viewers who are far away from home and lonely, eager to hear their own tongue spoken. It has asked the West German viewers to understand that these foreign workers, who are so welcome as workers, are also to be made welcome however possible in West Germany.

With all the flaws of government red tape, censorship controls, dull officialdom, and slow procedures, the West German television is still coming out ahead on the international scene as it dares to provoke and challenge its viewers with topics relating to racial prejudices. And what should be of significance to the Americans, where the tv audiences are often sated with old movies and light vaudeville, the people here watch the television shows that deal with these thought-provoking themes. And so the medium is actually being used as it was originally planned, to educate and inform instead of merely to entertain.

These days, the price of a turkey is too darned high

You know that overrating ratings can lead to a hit show that reaches a costly quantity of non-prospects. And the cash register will ring up a turkey.

Also you know that even if you reach the right prospects — but with the wrong commercials — it's another kind of turkey. Equally costly.

You know, too, that the advertiser who does not move swiftly to get the right show, at the right time, may see his competition get the business. And he gets the bird.

In these days of spiraling costs, choosy consumers and speedy competitors — who can afford a turkey of any kind?

Doesn't it make sense to want a whole combination of smart programming, swift daring, and creative selling commercials?

Don't you need an agency which is best equipped, on all fronts, to bring down your cost per sale — and bring up your profits from television?

an honest leader. If you want to claim it took, first Governor Collins and then Parson Minow and now Conscience Swezey to revive that old time religion, so go ahead. Could be.

What intrigues me, interwoven throughout the more obvious duties delegated to this office where implementation of the Television Code is concerned, is the stickier and harder to isolate matter of believability touched upon by those Hill & Knowlton chaps. This kind of thing is tougher to do something about because believability takes so much more know how and finesse at the ad agency level where, understandably, a major concentration is so often directed to effectiveness in terms of sale.

How far out of my province do I get, technically—how far out of bounds is any Code-subscribing clearance office, doing its best to implement the good taste and other Television Code ground rules—if we raise a demur on believability in that word's broader sense? When a 60-second commercial introduces some glamorized doll in a setting more fabulous than something from the Arabian Nights, should we or someone else or a combination of us in the trade have anticipated the difficulty for common sense viewers of taking seriously this chick's purring encouragement for a commodity which she is pushing that just is not suited to the artificial context created for it?

Maybe I risk smearing the whole of television advertising by excerpting such a blip as this but only if some lug quotes me out of context. But how else is there to get after these exaggerated production handlings which reflect too little that is real for the average among us and too often, for that matter, nothing with which even in our daydreaming fantasies we can identify? Such insulting to the intelligence absurdities patently invite incredulity, subconscious or otherwise, when projected on a television screen towards which very discerning husbands, wives and children are focussing their attention. A substantial number of viewers by now are sophisticated enough to expect and deserve more solid facts.

No one will argue that laundry products should not be recommended for everything from a baby's diapers to lingerie. But what of those which are promoted in some commercials where invariably a slickly groomed housewife is caressing her cheek with the finished product? Is it all that washday "whiteness" which is extolled in a sort of white-on-white haberdashery tradition? Or take the demonstrations of some cosmetic soaps which face a model to the camera in a kingsized bathroom lathering her forehead, her cheekbones and chin in the neatest — but most unrelated — fashion compared with actual facewashing. Or certain cigaret smoked by glamorized models in tropical settings where more natives would ordinarily abound than do great numbers of us. Then sprinkle these in turn, punctuate them, with claims about eight-out-of-10 or one-out-of six or three-out-of-four who do this, that or the other as though what, in certain cases, may be no more than a handful sampling should be taken by consumers presumed to be gullible as having universal application. These are the indefinable gray influences hard to isolate in letter and in spirit. The aura created by their unbelievability surrounds and colors the believability of more basically realistic pitches with which any reasonable viewer is willing to identify. And finally, detractors of this next argument notwithstanding, the good things advertisers and their agencies do are judged in the context of these "bad" things done by, presumably, other advertisers and their agencies.

1961 took us along a progress road marred only by such puerile litter. If it is true that "every little bit counts" methinks it obvious all of us might do well to concentrate in the year ahead on tidying up the television landscape.

TV In Hong Kong In Upward Swing; '61 Turning Point

By ERNIE PEREIRA

Hong Kong.

Television, which never really caught on in this energetic and resourceful town of 3,000,000 people since its inception in 1957, is now beginning to get into stride.

As 1961 ended, television was experiencing a boom, auguring brighter prospects ahead for it.

Rediffusion TV, solely engaged in tv broadcasting here, has reported an undisclosed profit for the first time after having been for years in the red. TV here has definitely "turned the corner," according to Mark Miller, the tv controller of program. Not only has the demand for sets gone up but so has the number of program hours been increased from 38 to 50 per week.

All this is significant. A young Englishman, Miller, who was flown out to Hong Kong from England over a year ago to set things right in tv here, apparently has achieved a measure of success by giving better programs.

Some 10,000 tv sets are now out. This represents a 50% increase over the number of sets in circulation in 1960. Sets are bought outright by viewers who pay a monthly rental of about $4.50 to Rediffusion for use of programs and maintenance.

Just what should the peak tv subscription be?

No market research was ever made to find out this, but it is believed that the maximum figure would be about 50,000 sets for a viewing public of 200,000 reckoning that one set, on an average, will be watched by four persons.

The Colony's economic situation and the fact that tv is considered a luxury to large segments of the proliferating population whose purchasing power is woefully weak are factors which weigh against any bigger envisaged figure. Rediffusion is confidently hopeful of reaching this 50,000 target in the next few years. TV sets are presently being bought at the rate of about 400 a month.

$22 a Minute Com'l

Sale of commercials has risen—it costs $22 to advertise a product for one-minute tv time.

TV is operated here, as it is already known, on a closed wired circuit. The one black spot in the overall tv picture, bright as it looked at the end of the year, was this:

Hopes to start broadcast tv from a site which was expected to have been picked during the past year have considerably cooled down.

Rediffusion, it is known, had been investigating the possibility of broadcast television to expand its service with the purpose of tapping potential viewing groups of people living in satellite towns.

Now, it seems, an extension of tv to these areas, will be done via the wired circuit system which is servicing only the Colony's urban districts.

Color tv, because of its technical complications, is something too far ahead for Hong Kong to think of having. Perhaps it will eventually come in the march of progress.

TV sets sold here are made in Britain and Japan. The price range is from $95 to $120 per set. Speculation was once rife that a tv plant would be started here to make sets in the Colony, but this has turned out to be sheer talk.

Rediffusion TV spent about $195,000 in 1960 in buying tv films from America and Britain, with the U.S. easily the bigger market. It is believed that the company in 1961 spent about the same money in buying films from these two countries, although it has dropped well over a dozen programs, "Count of Monte Cristo," the "Lilli Palmer Show," the "M Squad," "Lassie," and "Robin Hood" shows being among them.

NBC, Warner Bros., CBS, Screen Gems, ABC and Granada now supply films to Rediffusion which, for an undisclosed reason, is not buying from MCA.

Westerns, because of the international language they speak, are the most popular viewing fare. "Laramie," "Maverick," Cheyenne" and "Bronco" enjoy high ratings with viewers.

Canadian Radio In Upbeat, Attributed To Better Programs

By PAUL GORMLEY

Ottawa

Radio in Canada is a long way from the deathbed coma so many attribute to it. Canadian Broadcasting Corp.'s radio sales went up 17% over last year's, to total $2,280,000 in the fiscal year just past, and sales of AM receivers upped 7.1% in Canada in the same year. Canadians bought 1,423,795 AMers in 1960 compared to 1,329,189 in 1959.

1961 figures aren't available as this is written but indications are that radio will grow in all respects. There was, for example, a 27.2% gain in set sales at the end of the first quarter.

Broadcasting stations increased, too. In the last decade, 65 new privately-owned AM stations preemed in Canada to bring the total to 196 privaters, 28 CBC, and the list shows specific signs of growing at a good rate according to upcoming applications before the Board of Broadcast Governors.

There has been a real switch in production formats. Short, fast-moving shows seem to be the style. Example: Swift-Canadian Co.'s 10-minute stanza, running five days a week, starring Giselle Mackenzie.

The upped AM sales didn't just happen. All radio stations have put on brisk, effective sales drives, increased both the power and the number of staffers to sell. But they wouldn't have sold a minute of airtime if they hadn't been able to back up their gabbing with okay shows. CBC's webs, both running coast to coast, Trans-Canada using only CBC stations, Dominion using affiliates, carried airers like Don Messer's hoedowner, Trans-Canada Matinee, John Cameron Swayze, others. Radio had its steady faves as well, such as CBC "Wednesday Night," a cultural top-runner; "Songs of My People," CBC "Stage" drama stints and symphony sessions. Specials like the "Royal Wedding," boxing and hockey drew even bigger audiences, and bigger bankrolls.

Canadian Assn. of Broadcasters, grouping the non-CBC stations, believes a big force in upping AM's business has been the postwar boom in immigration, with more than 2,000,000 new Canadians arriving since the war. This cued more than 60 AMers to air foreign-language shows. Talks stanzas are big business, too. Toronto's CHUM collected hefty attention with its "Speak Your Mind" stanza. In Montreal, CKGM's "Open Mind" got into strong controversial items with live audiences.

While 6,000,000 Canadians watched this country's football classic, the Grey Cup game, via video, another 1,000,000 listened to the airer on AM. At the same time even more heard the game on CBC's shortwave in the far north and Europe.

TV Sparse In Some Sectors

It is estimated that about 3,500,000 Canadian homes do not have television, a million of them live beyond tv's reach. They dial AM regularly and both CBC and private stations cater to them.

Production design has moved fast to aim shows at one person at a time. Once, radio produced for the people in the living room. Now it beams at people in kitchens, bedrooms, automobiles, on park benches, in offices. The housewife has returned to radio for backgound sound as she does her household chores and programmers know it. CBC figures hundreds of thousands of homemakers dial its "Trans-Canada Matinee."

Broadcasters figure, also, that tv watchers have learned to turn off the video when it doesn't give them what they want and turn on the AM set. And they state clear and loud that tv audiences are proving carnivals particular about the fare on the screen. As CBC's president, J. A. Ouimet put it: "Either the audience doesn't have a television set for the program, or the set doesn't have a program for the audience." Ouimet doesn't see AM and tv working in a complementary scheme. Sounds logical, he said: radio with music when video has drama, or football on tv

Only 2 Hours From B'way & It's Like Mars—A Radioite's Bucolic Heaven

By MARY MARGARET McBRIDE

West Shokan, N. Y.

As a sleek modern automobile travels, I'm only a little more than two hours from Broadway. But the difference between this life and the one I left when I gave up my apartment at 230 Central Park South in Manhattan wouldn't be much greater if I'd move to Mars.

My permanent address today is a barn remodelled some) in West Shokan, New York. West Shokan is a village of two score homes in the Catskills with the post office and general store housed together. My friends, the storekeepers, help me out with such major problems as how best to keep the white-bellied field mice out of my barn—and they sent strong-arm reinforcements when I had my burglar.

My barn is up the hill a piece from the store and to left and right are wooded mountains. The view from my front porch hung among the trees like a bubble is an ancient apple orchard and beyond, stretching away for 40 miles, a great lake (really a reservoir that supplies water to you city people), with the loveliest mountains in the world rising in back.

My barn is redwood on the outside and inside the panelling is redwood pine. Everywhere bookshelves reach to the ceiling and all the tables and window seats are piled with the volumes I'm working on at the moment—from John Gunther's "Inside Europe Today" to the newest garden guide, W. H. Auden's and Ogden Nash's poetry, and the latest Agatha Christie mystery.

I am up at 5:30 a.m. in summer to watch the sun rise and to inspect my growing things—a row of tall red, pink and gold hollyhocks lined up against the north wall, windowboxes of scarlet petunias and geraniums, my rose border and the walled cutting garden awash with color. The wall was made by a 76-year-old stone mason, almost the last of his craft.

A humming bird hovering above a sweet william almost but not quite) comes to my hand; a deer family, mother, father and baby, scamper into the woods. The transplanted ramblers on the stone wall seem to be taking root nicely, they, too, have come from Broadway to the Catskills.

In 1959, I refused to sign a new contract with Lester Lewis, my agent. Reason—I didn't want to work. Lester said, "That's all right. I'll do what I can for you anyway."

One frigid morning last January he telephoned that the J. B. Williams Co. wanted me to do a television commercial. I answered, as I had several times before, "You know I don't want to work."

Later that day the president of the company called. He and his wife just happened, he said, to be driving up to the Catskill the next afternoon. Could they stop by? They did. I gave them tea and tried to behave modestly when they praised my snow-draped landscape.

Suddenly Edward Kletter, looking round at the 200-year-old beams in my livingroom, exclaimed "This would be a fine place for television!"

Secure in the belief that it would cost a fortune, I answered airily, "Oh, in that case I might do those commercials." Three days later I was doing them.

In the midst of our worst snowstorm of that blustery winter, a great truck came bearing technicians. Executives plowed through the drifts in their Cadillacs. A hairdresser, a makeup artist and even a few scriptwriters brought the roster up to 25 or 30.

In my livingroom which still

Where do New Yorkers turn for the best in music? To WQXR, of course. America's Number One Good Music Station is the favorite of more than 1,300,000 metropolitan area families. And a favorite of many of America's biggest advertisers, too. They use WQXR to make profitable sales to better-income families in the world's biggest market.

THIS IS HOW A STAR IS BORNE...AT G.A.C.!

If ever an expression aptly described the treatment G.A.C. gives its imposing roster of stars, this is it..."Handle With Care."

Every division of G.A.C.'s many faceted organization is headed and staffed by the top pros in the business. Under their careful guidance the road to stardom is shorter and the orbit infinitely longer.

That is why more and more of today's top artists and creative talents in every field of entertainment are represented by G.A.C.

Your car, madame . . .

But where is the car? Here we are floating . . .

Magic, you say? Yes! Camera and film magic!

FILM does the unusual!

A writer is in deep thought . . .

"M-m-m—magic ride. How can we do that? A flying carpet? M-m-m—could be? But can't we do better?"

The writer drops back into deep thought. Suddenly . . .

"I've got it! Magic ride! Young couple—riding through the country. No car—just floating. Magic! That's what we want!"

Grand idea. But how to do it?

Film was the answer—film with all its versatility—its adaptability. Film with a special prism camera—plus time, patience, skill.

Result: a TV commercial to rave about—unusual in every way—beauty—impact—memory value.

But that's film for you! Film does the unusual—gives you the commercials you want—and when!

What's more, film, and film alone, gives you the convenience, coverage and penetration of multiple markets that today's total selling requires.

TELESISTEMA MEXICANO, S. A.

EDIFICIO TELEVICENTRO — AVENIDA CHAPULTEPEC No. 18
MEXICO 1, D. F.

MEXICAN TELEVISION — 1961 REPORT

Mexican Television is nearing adolescence: 1962 marks its eleventh year. Commercially operated and privately owned, television in Mexico has been strictly a Mexican job. Because no electronic equipment is produced in the country, the transmitters, cameras, videotape units, etc., are imported but the human element is native.

In a period of only eleven years, Mexican TV, now operated by Telesistema Mexicano, S.A., has grown into an industry with a monthly payroll of about one and a half million pesos. The number of people on the payroll is very close to one thousand. Another million and a half pesos, or perhaps more, is paid to talent. Television is now, without any doubt, larger source of income for talent—actors, singers, comedians, musici . m...'s —than either the movies or the stage.

These figures are the result of only five years of hard work. It was in 1955 when the three channels 2, 4 and 5—installed in Mexico City merged into the corporation called Telesistema Mexicano, S.A. Two years after this merger, the three channels were out of the red. In the last three years, Telesistema has expanded to achieve a nation-wide operation. Telesistema now feeds seventeen stations, owned, partly owned or affiliated with it. Of these seventeen stations, four are repeaters.

Channels 2 and 4 service Mexico City (five million inhabitants) and with microwave links up in the hills (Channels 3, 6, 7 and 9) reach some twelve States. The potential viewing audi covered by these repeaters is estimated at another five million people. Channel 5 in Mexico City covers only the metropolitan area. All programming to feed the repeaters originates from Channels 2 and 4 in Mexico City. This operation constitutes the only and permanent network.

Ten TV stations are spread over the northern section of Mexico, located in large cities. (See Map, circles.) Monterrey and Guadalajara have studio facilities and all ten stations have one, in some cases two, AMPEX videotape units. Mexico City has five. Today most of the five programs and commercials are taped for distribution. Not long ago Telesistema purchased a large AMPEX videotape Mobile Unit, self-powered, with 25 KVA.

Three new local stations will be on the air very soon, in the cities of Merida, the southeast, and Culiacan and Ciudad Obregon, the northwest. (See Map, dots.)

Mexicans of all ages and conditions are becoming more and more addicted to TV. Sales of iving sets are going faster than ever and today the estimated number of sets in use is figured at just under, if not slightly over, one million. Of these, six hundred thousand add to the entertainment of the Mexico City homes. Four of the local stations operating near the Mexico-U.S.A. border (two in Tijuana, one in Mexicali and one in Nuevo Laredo) have a potential viewing audience in the U.S. territory, with an estimated 400,000 sets.

Channels 2, 4 and 5 in Mexico City are on the air daily, with schedules that vary from ten to sixteen hours. Channel 2 begins its telecasts at eight in the morning and ends around midnight. Channel 4 opens at three-thirty in the afternoon and closes around one o'clock in the morning. Channel 5 starts at three in the afternoon and signs off at midnight. The three chanels offer the audience a choice of some sixty programs every day. Around seventy per cent of all programs originating Mexico City are produced in the studios, either, live or taped.

Telesistema's working force has almost reached the 1,000 mark, as mentioned above. They are all together in one building, called "Televicentro," housing eighteen studios and all facilities. Everything needed for broadcasting is within or atop the building: the towers, the transmitters, the master controls, the videotape units, the film projectors. But each channel has its own staffs. Yet, the location of the equipment and the facilities all close by, including set building, prop department and maintenance, means a very large cut in the costs of operation. Thus the company is able to adjust itself to the economic conditions that prevail in the country and which calls for low tariffs. In fact, rates for time and facilities are exceptionally low as compared to those in the U.S.A.

Mexicans are very happy with TV, mainly the middle-income groups. Their preference is clearly shown in the ratings. Month after month and year after year, ine of the first ten programs are Mexican shows, mainly drama, comedy and musicals, all produced in the studios. As of this writing there are being telecast forty-two Hollywood film programs, dubbed into Spanish, every week.

Aside from the seventeen stations and repeaters operated by Telesistema, Mexico has six independent stations located as follows: one in Guadalajara, one in Monterrey, one in Nuevo Laredo, one in Nogales and two in Ciudad Juarez.

As in the U.S.A., television programming is carefully watched in Mexico by the Government. There is a clear trend towards more informative, as well as an increase in educational and culture programs. Now and then certain groups complain about the excess of TViolence in American films series.

The little screen has increased the popularity of theatrical actors and actresses and, while in 1951 Mexico City had only two or three legitimate theaters, there are now about twenty.

Note:
Readers of VARIETY may as well know that Telesistema Mexicano has no commercial representative in the U.S. or any other foreign countries. Program or spot advertising of imported goods is sold to distributors located in Mexico.

It's so easy for people to register displeasure. In broadcasting, an audience can ignore you with a mere turn of a knob or the push of a button. A choice is presented, a judgement is made. ## TV Director McLaglen: 'If Violence Becomes Necessary, Then Use It'

Minneapolis.

Andrew McLaglen, who has directed numerous segments of television's "Have Gun Will Travel," "Gunsmoke," "Rifleman," "Gunslinger" and even 'Perry Mason" series, which undoubtedly are as replete with what its critics consider "violence" as anything on video, defends its use when "it's essential."

Here with his wife to visit the latter's family, McLaglen told an interviewer that, like others, the adverse criticism of tv which he hears most "is that there's too much emphasis on violence and sex in it."

As far as he himself is concerned, McLaglen said that he believes violence should be used when it is necessary to the point of the story, when it's sometimes absolutely necessary but only then.

"We get characters into violent situations and we have to get them out," he explained.

with Greek mythology on AM. Good in theory, but not in practice, he added; "Too many people still look to radio for all or most of their broadcast fare."

Radio and tv may be complementary at times, Quimet believed, but they will go their own ways.

Canadian radio has cleaned up its own rugs in recent years. As in the United States, AM showed a trend to rock 'n' roll which grew to practically take over the disk-spinner shows and filter into almost any shows except news. The trend was reversed about a year ago in Canada when the pressure went on the last few holdout stations. BBG kept a close watch on programming with the hanging threat that licenses wouldn't be renewed if the stations didn't come around to airing better shows. The smart-aleck gabber also went out with the rock 'n' roll craze and with the exception of a few announcers and deejays who will never reform because they know nothing else, listening to AM in Canada is once again a pleasure at almost any time—and dialers can pick those times.

smells of the hay it held all those years, two cameras taped my efforts for Conti shampoo. In my little study the executives viewed each take and passed on it. By 5 p.m. we had finished and I had changed from my working uniform (blue dress with white collars and cuffs) back to the pants and smock that I wear in the Catskills.

Lester, volunteer agent (I hope this won't wreck him with his union), has produced other profitable deals, one involving a dress, another a cookbook. But he mailed me the papers and I didn't have to go to New York.

"You do better not working," he quipped recently. I reminded him that he's doing pretty well as my "former" agent—he still gets his 10%.

I haven't been to New York for months and hope I'll not be going soon. Only a dire crisis could send me there. I did put on a corset once, though, in that period. This was when WGHQ opened its new transmitter and I sat on a dais at the Governor Clinton in Kingston, N. Y., among such visiting celebrities as Ambassador Jock Whitney, Senator Jacob K. Javits, Walter Thayer, president of the Herald Tribune, and Martin Stone. Delightful as the gentlemen were, I couldn't get home fast enough to tear off my gala attire.

The air up here has been breathed only by me. The only noise is bird song, insect hum or cricket chirp. In fall the color is unbelievable. In winter everything is covered with snow that falls as lightly as down and stays unsullied for months. On a little redwood platform outside my west window, chickadees and nuthatches banquet on suet and seed that I put there. Weekends come my regulars, old friends who are fugitives, poor things, from the city. They efficiently garden in season, cook, wash dishes and do any chores that require getting down on your knees (mine are rheumatic). A 72-year-old neighbor keeps my lawn mowed.

What's it like to be away from New York City's rat race? Answer: it's heaven! I've never been so serene and contented in my life. So come up and see me sometime.

The Theatre In The English Provinces

Biz Up—No Dependence on Yank Acts, Which Are Overpriced Anyway—Completing the Cycle, TV Now a Fountainhead of Talent

By LESLIE A. MACDONNELL
(Managing Director, Moss' Empires Ltd.)

London.

About three years ago when I joined Moss' Empires with the job of looking after some 15 theatres, even my best friends told me I was stark raving mad, and to quote one or two of them I needed the job like a hole in the head.

What was the reason for this pessimistic outlook? It was quite simple. There was no business in the provincial theatres.

Admittedly, our three properties in London, namely, the Palladium, Victoria Palace and the Hippodrome, were all pretty well fixed up but literally they were subsidizing the rest of the provincial theatres.

What is the position today?

I am happy to report a very more optimistic one, and I can sincerely say that whenever we play first class attractions in the provinces we do first class business.

What are the reasons for this great change around in a comparatively short space of time? In my opinion they are many.

Firstly, television's impact is no longer as strong as it was three years ago and people are now accepting tv as a service and not just as a novelty; consequently, they are returning to the theatre in much greater numbers.

Secondly, the type of entertainment that they are being offered has radically changed. Three years ago we were running a series of twice-nightly music halls. Now, we are running theatres and the majority of our attractions are once-nightly.

Variety as such is as dead as the proverbial dodo and only occasionally can we get away with a twice-nightly variety bill, and then only with the biggest names. By this I do not mean that we never play variety—on the contrary, we wrap it up and sell it as a spectacular with boys and girls, scenery, costumes, etc., and many of the acts working together in production. By doing this, it can often run six weeks in a major city whereas the same acts would only last one week. This, naturally, is a blessing to the booking committee because with the shortage of supply, it is more than a considerable help.

In addition, we play ballet, opera, D'Oyly Carte, straight plays, revues and similar once-nightly attractions for which the public will pay almost double compared to the old music hall prices.

The position as we find it today is that there is room, except with rare exceptions, for a modern theatre in practically every major city in the country, but what used to be regarded as the No. 2 dates have no hope whatsoever and the majority of these theatres have already been closed.

It may seem paradoxical that three years ago even some of our own people in the company felt that it was a waste of time to persevere and keep on pouring money down the drain as far as the English provinces were concerned, whereas now the exact opposite point of view is taken and we have acquired one new theatre, namely the Palace Manchester, and plans are actively in hand for the building of two possibly three new theatres in the next two or three years.

In other words, the five-year plan should work out that we have as many theatres at the end of five years as we did at the beginning, with the exception that they will be modern and literally of London Palladium standard.

Yank Angle

Where do our American friends come into this picture? Very rarely, I am afraid, because the very few American headliners who would be boxoffice in this country are certainly boxoffice in their own country, so why should they spend 30 or 40 weeks in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, Birmingham, etc., when they can possibly pick up more money by staying in their own backyard.

I am not being too critical when I say that the majority of the American artists who do want to come here are overpriced and more and more are we relying on British attractions, and strangely enough many of these attractions have been created by television so we are turning the complete circle.

In other words, these attractions who almost put us out of business are now earning a very lucrative living by coming back to the live theatre having created a new public by their television exposure. One of the outstanding examples is the BBC's Black & White Minstrel Show.

It is quite reasonable to suppose that my company were not going to spend large sums of money in modernizing, refurbishing and neon-lighting their theatres in the provinces, but I am happy to say that in many theatres we have completely re-seated the auditorium, have installed modern stagelighting eqquipment, and have spent anything up to 30 to 40% more on the orchestra, for example, to get higher standard of musicianship, all of which has paid off.

Booking Aspect

Another very important aspect is the booking position. Three years ago, I literally did not know what attractions we were playing on Monday next, whereas in the majority of our main provincial theatres for 1962 they are already completely booked, but booked with attractions which can be at this moment underwritten as far as their profitability is concerned. This is naturally a complete turn around in a short period of three years. When I say completely booked, there is just the odd week or two possibly lacking.

I don't want to sound too cynical, but I am afraid that my buying visits to America have become more and more of a social visit, because although I can, on behalf of my company, have a fairly liberal cheque book, it becomes more and more difficult to find the worthwhile attractions that are suitable for our theatres.

On my last trip (which incidentally was my 58th round trip) after travelling 15,000 miles I was only able to buy one show and two specialty acts, and then at the last minute the girl in the specialty act decided to get married and go out of the business so I ended up with one, which is currently playing the Palladium with great success. Hardly a worthwhile trip.

The reason of course that it is difficult to find suitable acts in America is that most of them come from Europe anyway, and it is much simpler to slip over to Paris, Hamburg or Copenhagen where one doesn't have to amortize the cost of bringing back the act to their own Continent.

In conclusion, it has been pretty hard going but I now think we are over the worst and look forward to a continued upsurge of business.

Nineteen sixty-two looks as if it is going to be better than this year, and this year is certainly better than last year, so we are certainly moving in the right direction. After all there is nothing like "The magic of a visit to the live theatre."

Why Australian Talent Powders

By RAYMOND STANLEY

Melbourne.

General opinion here is that once an Australian artist makes it overseas he's not likely to return for legit appearances. It's not that he scorns the land of his birth, but he likes the money available elsewhere.

Whilst on recent visit to the U.K. this writer quizzed several Aussies in the theatre world. Those contacted were most cooperative and talked freely. Only Peter Finch ignored the request for an interview.

In almost every case those who were seen said they would prefer to live Down Under but lack of employment opportunities kept them away.

Actors like Keith Michell and Leo McKern would enjoy a return for theatre engagements but "receive no offers." Neither is adverse to settling back in Aussie permanently.

John Bluthal, now playing Fagin in London production of "Oliver," puts it more bluntly. "Let's face it," he says, "for an Aussie actor in Australia its rock bottom! The conditions and treatment of local artists are absolutely appalling. "Why should an actor like myself—and many others—who could earn a good living in Australia, pack up with wife and family and leave to face the tough competition of a place like London, knowing full well that we have to start from scratch? Because there seems to be no room back home. There's little or no recognition for talent any innate ability. Many of the managements—particularly in television—are tough businessmen who want to turn over a quick buck.

Shaws Vs. Cathay in Malaya

Singapore & Hong Kong Film Operations Many-Faceted and Dynamically Expansive

By OOI TAW CHIEW

Singapore.

This metropolis and the backcountry region of Malaya are dominated, cinematically, by two corporate entities, (1) Cathay Organization controlled by Dato Loke Wan Thou and (2) Runme and Run Run Shaw, otherwise known as Shaw Bros. Together theirs in a practical monopoly in terms of production, exhibition and distribution of films.

Additionally, the Shaws operate a chain of eight Amusement parks, a cross between a Royal Easter Show and a Disneyland in Singapore and the Federation of Malaya. Each covering acres, they afford recreational facilities plus showcasing for industrial and trade exhibitions.

Shaws cinema circuit now numbers 127 theatres, many air-conditioned such as the Capitol and Lido here. Properties include Hong Kong, Thailand, South Vietnam, Taiwan, the Borneo territories, Malaya and Singapore.

It is the Shaws' policy, per Publicity and Advertising Director, William H. Goodwin, to give its paying guests the "best in entertainment. Such as "King of Kings."

Operation of cinemas, amusement parks, film production studios is just a part of the manifold activities of the brothers. They are one of the largest distributors of motion picture films in the world. In Singapore and Malaya, the product of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Warners and United Artists is exclusively channeled through them. A Shaw affiliate distributes Universal. Shaws have also exhibited the product of RKO-Radio and Columbia, while Republic Pictures, until it ceased production, circulated here via Shaw.

Cinerama is exclusively licensed to Shaws here.

"A King In New York," with Charles Chaplin, was acquired by Shaws for release in Singapore, Thailand, Philippines and Hong Kong.

Shaw Bros. is the sole distributor for Associated-British-Pathe, Anglo-Amalgamated, Lion International (British Lion and other Independents), Miracle Films, Britannia Films, Regal International, Renown Pictures and several other British producers.

Lotsa Italo Epics

Shaws in recent years acquired practically all spear-and-sandal Italian films for South-East Asia. These include "The Last Days of Pompeii;" "The Revolt of the Gladiators," "Nights of Lucrece Borgia," "The White Devil" (Hadji Murad) and "Hercules & the Queen of Lydia" (American title: "Hercules Unchained)," "Aphrodite the Goddess of Love" and the recently-shown "David & Goliath."

From Germany, Shaws handled UFA's "The Girl In the Tigerskin" and others while negotiations are underway for a longterm distribution deal with UFA. Shaws' other sources of supply from Germany are Carol Hellman's Omnia Films, Transocean, Neuefilm and Union Film, all of whom are in close contact with the Shaw representative in Europe," states a Shaws' press statement.

Just recently Shaw Bros. of Hong Kong signed with Toei of Japan for co-production of three features annually utilizing stars of both lands. First to be filmed is a modern drama to be shot early next year. The still-valid existing deal for Shaws to handle Toei product in South-East Asia was extended for two more years calling for 15 items per annum.

Shaws' production studios in Singapore and Hong Kong, produce averagely above 60 feature films in Mandarin, Cantonese and Malay. Its Merdeka Films Studio in Kuala Lumpur, Malaya, in partnership with Ho Ah Loke, has turned out five full-length black-cum-white features since its inception early this year.

Shaw cinemas, offices, branches, printing sections, studios etc., provide regular employment to 5,000 men and women, excluding the 10,000 "extras" and casual workers employed in film productions and other occupations in Singapore, Malaya and Borneo.

Asian Film Fest

Shaw production studios have been responsible for a succession of top box office attractions including technicolored "Hang Tuah," which has been shown in "Art Houses" in the United States and "Sumpah Orang Minyak" (the "Oily Man") which together have won awards at Asian Film Festivals in the last five years. Hang Tuah, based on a Malay legend, was presented at the Berlin Film Festival two years ago. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer is distributing it in the Middle East. Recently, Shaws Chinese coloured-historical "Diau Charn of the Three Kingdoms" won awards for the Best Actress (Lin Dai), Best Direction, Best Music and Best Scenario. Seventh Asiatic Film Festival held in Tokyo April 4-9, 1961, saw Shaws' "Back Door" sweeping the field of

August Strindberg, Genius: Swedish Type

50 Years After His Death He's a Demigod in Native Land Which Abominated Him When Living—Was a Mass of Angers, Prejudices and Progressive Ideas—Enormously Fertile Playwright

By FREDERIC FLEISHER

(In last year's Anniversary Edition, correspondent Fleisher described a Swedish genius of the cinema, Ingmar Bergman. It happens that at the present time Sweden is preparing to celebrate the 50th year since August Strindberg's death. He, too, had the flamboyance of high talent, incredible drive and energy. His characteristics and his artistic standing are indicated below.—Ed.)

Stockholm.

August Strindberg was a man driven and fascinated by opposites. He was sincerely and enthusiastically carried away by his loves which were always mixed with hate. At times he wanted to be a man of the people and at other periods, under the influence of Nietzsche, he had only contempt for the "masses." In his youth Strindberg planned to study medicine but shortly afterwards he tried to become an actor. He was fascinated by occultism and different religions and felt perseecuted by evil spirits. He was equally attracted to scientific research and even tried to chemically produce gold. His literary favorites included such varied authors as Shakespeare, Zola, Hans Christian Andersen and Mark Twain.

Throughout his works and life Strindberg was spontaneous and extremely involved in everything he did. He often claimed he wrote out of anger and his anger was almost constant though its targets changed. He attacked many aspects to Swedish society and sought to gain revenge on his enemies and loves through his writings. Most of his friendships and loves led to violent breaches and he often felt spiritual persecuted by his former friends and loves.

Strindberg's works were characterized by spontaneity, straightforwardness and explosiveness. It is here that Strindberg's translators have failed him as they have been unable to convey his vitality and eruptiveness. Even the better translations of Strindberg's works, which have become available in more recent years, are almost always watered down versions. Many translators, however, have either had an insufficient knowledge of English or Swedish to come anywhere close to presenting the real Strindberg. All translators have been unable to catch Strindberg's constant revolution and shattering intensity.

During the 1961-1962 season most Swedish theatres are commemorating the 50th anniversary of Strindberg's death with at least one production of one of his plays. The Swedish Broadcasting Co., government-regulated monopoly is airing one Strindberg play each month during an eight month period which started in October.

Strindberg was born in 1849 and died on May 14, 1912. Soon the copyrights on his works will run out. Against this background a survey of Strindberg's finances during his lifetime and changes of attitudes towards his works may be justified.

Strindberg's prolific literary output was enormous. His collected works, which include dramas, autobiographies, short stories, novels, essays and poetry, numbers 55 volumes. The Strindberg Society in Stockholm is in the process of publishing his collected letters. Seven 400-page volumes have already been released and it is believed that the entire collection will fill 14 volumes in all.

Always in Jam

Although Strindberg was immensely productive, he was constantly in financial troubles. Temperamentally explosive, he often changed publisher and for many years experienced difficulty getting theatres to stage any of his plays. A victim of a persecution complex which drove into periods of almost total isolation, his easily irritated personality made for major complications in his relationships with the many publishers who tried, usually without much success, to support and encourage him.

Strindberg published his first major work, the play "Master Olaf," at his own expense. The following year, 1879, a Stockholm publisher took on his novel "The Red Room," which was immediately heralded as an outstanding work of Swedish prose. Somewhat later Karl Otto Bonnier, the young son of Albert Bonnier who had founded what is today Sweden's largest publishing house carrying over 200 new titles annually, wanted to become the publisher for the new generation, and he had been quite taken by some of Strindberg's writings. With his father's permission, Karl Otto Bonnier contracted the debt-plagued Strindberg in 1883. Although Strindberg had expressed strong anti-Semitic feelings, he saw an opportunity to improve his finances through his tie-up with the Jewish publishing family, and he persuaded Bonnier to pay off his debts.

Hardly a year after the firm of Bonnier contracted Strindberg, "Married," the famous collection of satiric short stories about marriage, was put on the market. In the book Strindberg had emphasized the importance of the physical side of marriage relations and this gave rise to a storm of protests. Finding no legal support for an attack on Strindberg's discussions of sex, the author's enemies charged him with "blasphemy" as he had made a slurring reference to the Lord's Supper. Living in Switzerland at the time, Strindberg saw no reason to return to Sweden to defend his work in court. Worried over the situation, Karl Otto Bonnier rushed to the Continent and persuaded Strindberg, nervous and apprehensive, to return with him.

His Famous Trial

On arrival in Stockholm Strindberg was met at the station by friends and here he made his first "platform speech." The trial of "Married" opened the next day and lasted a month, but in the end Strindberg was acquitted. Immediately flooded with orders for the book from all over Scandinavia, Bonniers decided, however, not to print a second edition.

The court decision did not purify Strindberg—or his publishers—in the eyes of many persons. Three years later, in 1887, a Stockholm school teacher published a booklet, "Strindberg's Literature and Immorality Among School Children."

The following years, Strindberg's persecution complex grew to such proportions that some feel that he crossed the border into insanity. His divorce from Siri von Essen, who is believed to have been his first and great love (Although Strindberg loved Siri von Essen intensively he later sought equally intense revenge when he portrayed her as Laura in "The Father" and Tekla in "Creditors"), his breach with Bonniers, his second and only few month long marriage and numerous other emotional problems can be regarded as causes of his so-called "Inferno" crisis. Living in Paris in 1894, Strindberg experienced a conversion which he described as "the big crisis at the age of fifty, revolutions in the soul, desert wanderings, devastation, Swedenborg's hells and heavens." Strindberg wrote two books in French describing his Inferno crisis.

After this period of Strindberg's life he entered another one of extreme productivity. During the last 15 years of his life he wrote 29 plays, 15 books of prose and a volume of poetry. After his "Inferno" crisis Strindberg apparently released much of his previously repressed originality. His first post-"Inferno" play was the three section of "The Road to Damascus," written between 1898 and 1901, showed that he was no longer a realist or a naturalist, but he had chosen to portray an inner reality, where words and motions became symbols.

During the last few years of his life Strindberg tried to run his own little theatre as he still had difficulty getting Swedish theatres to produce his works, and those who were interested did not want to stage his more recent plays. Operating his own theatre Strindberg soon found himself facing economic disaster and his publisher Bonnier came to his rescue.

During the final four years of his life Strindberg was seriously ill and he began to negotiate with Karl Otto Bonnier to turn over the exclusive rights to his works. He settled for $40,000—a tremendous figure at the time. In 1912, when Karl Otto Bonnier went to see the ailing writer to discuss the publication of Strindberg's collected works, the publisher saw the morning paper headlines: "Siri von Essen, August Strindberg's first wife, deceased." August Strindberg died a few weeks later.

During his lifetime, Strindberg's dream and chamber plays received little attention in Sweden. A few years after his death Max Reinhardt visited Sweden with his productions of these plays and laid the ground-work to their later appreciation. They did not gain a secure position until Olof Molander, a leading Swedish stage director, actor and one-time head of the Royal Dramatic Theatre, staged a number of them during the Thirties and Forties. During the past two decades Ingmar Bergman has also staged several of Strindberg's chamber plays.

At the time of his death, his greatness had only begun to be recognized in Sweden. Strindberg was a much too disputatious figure for the Swedes to calmly evaluate his importance. They were too involved in his life and his attacks on aspects of the Swedish society. A few years ago, however, a Swedish professor of literature summed up his importance as follows: "Each of us who writes Swedish now is—with or against his will—a student of Strindberg."

Be Kind to Critics?

By HOWARD M. TEICHMANN

One of the glaring omissions in the brand new Dramatists Guild dandy little Minimum Basic Agreement is a paragraph stipulating the Rights, Privileges, and Responsibilities of the playwright toward the critic after the party of the second part has written a murderous review of a play ascribed to the party of the first part.

H. M. Teichmann

Now you and I know that this sort of thing, a bad notice, happens from time to time. The fact that it happens to some of us more than it happens to others is why this little article is being written in the Christian Science Reading Room on Fifth Avenue rather than in the master's study of a villa overlooking Cap Ferrat.

By next year, it is to be hoped, the Minimum Basic will contain such a paragraph, and it is my privilege to be able to give you a small pre-season glimpse into the advices and suggestions which our subcommittee is drawing up. Following a disastrous opening night, a complete psychoanalysis of several years' duration is recommended. After that, a number of actions may be taken to fit many situations.

Suppose, for instance, you are at a picnic and a critic shows up. In such cases, always bring along a small child. After the adults have seated themselves at the picnic table, a good idea is to prod the little fellow to crawl under the table and sink his teeth into the critic's leg. This is a foolproof method as no matter what they say, no Critic would kick a five-year-old kid full in the face. Not publicly, at least.

Other situations in which the playwright might find himself are as follows: you are trapped in between floors in that self-service elevator with a critic who has just panned you. It will be a matter of hours before you are freed. Do not entertain him with the plot of your next play as it is well known that, under such conditions, many critics are poor sports and have no appreciation of art. An offer to share the hidden cache of Miltown which you have strapped around your waist will, under the circumstances, create a more favorable field of conversation.

Another possibility: you are jetting to the coast, first class (as the studio is footing the bill). The man who is seated next to you turns out to be one of those critics who gave it to you last time out. To insure a pleasant flight, refrain from saying you are not a playwright, as he will say "you are telling me, bub," and that will only cause more bad blood.

It is a lovely summer day. You are steering your little sailboat (the power cruiser they took away from you two flops ago) and you see a critic who was dissatisfied with your last effort being swept out to sea by that undercurrent they have arranged off the Hamptons. As he drifts by your bow, do not attempt to save his life as chances are his wife will never forgive you and will knock all of your plays as they ride to the theatre in a taxicab.

Suppose you give up the writing of plays and begin to practice dentistry in Montpelier, Vt. A critic who once slaughtered you rushes into your office with a terrible toothache.

Now about arguing with a critic regarding his artistic opinions. An eight-year study by our subcommittee has revealed that a playwright trying to prove to a critic that a bum notice was not justified stands as good a chance as a customer in a hurry trying to get his bill from a waiter. We do not recommend artistic arguments for, while the playwright has his integrity, the critic has his own integrity as well as a newspaper or magazine to back it up.

Nor do we recommend the "You were absolutely right, Kiddo" approach. These critics are not dummies. After all, they are smart enough not to write plays themselves so they will not be taken in by the you-were-absolutely-right-Kiddo routine.

Do not attempt flattery upon first encounter after a failure by telling him that in your set he is considered the critic's critic. He knows only too well that the critic's critic is the lady he married.

Of course, when you come face to face with them you can ignore them but this is not a good idea either as after a while, these critics will begin to notice that you are not pestering them and that will give them the thought that you are trying to curry favor, and then they will macerate you the next time around.

It is far, far better to adopt the look of a martyr and go around the streets saying they are only doing a job. The worst that can happen then is that a friendly policeman will pick you up and you will be sent to a rest home where you will be allowed to do nothing except take flights of fancy such as these. Either that, or you will end up writing another play for them to review.

Move Over, Nostradamus*

By GEORGE OPPENHEIMER

I have been asked by thousands of my admirers to set down my predictions for the theatre year of 1962.

Jack Paar will take Peggy Cass and a camera crew to Laos. On his return he will take the same aggregation to the U.S. Senate.

There will be published a new autobiography, "Money Or Your Life—or Both," the story of Gerold Frank as told to Brendan Behan.

David Merrick will produce a version of "Oedipus Rex," which will be about to fold until a woman in the audience will come on stage and shoot Oedipus. The woman will state in an exclusive interview, "I did it first for the sake of the mothers of the world and secondly for David Merrick who so kindly hired me." At the request of the actor's widow and children, Equity will arbitrate and decide that it was for the good of the show, now slated to run two years, thereby providing scores of actors (an actor will be shot every week) with employment.

Claudia Cassidy of the Chicago Tribune will bitterly attack the original company of a New York musical comedy smash because one of the chorus girls died and was replaced.

The Old Vic will do a New Wave drama.

The understudies for "An Evening with Yves Montand" will quit, giving as their reason "little opportunity for advancement."

Theatre '62 will present a new play by Samuel Beckett with no actors at all. In their place will be a wind machine representing the author, a broken Victrola record and two Mexican jumping beans. Critical opinion will be divided, one pro, one con, two on the fence and three missing.

Jerry Wald will announce a forthcoming epic, "The Life of Jerry Wald." The script will be written by Arnold Toynbee and Jerry Wald.

Tennessee Williams' new play will be titled, "Daddy-Withered-Legs."

Marlon Brando will walk off the set of "Mutiny on the Bounty," little realizing that shooting was completed and the set had been closed down for two months.

The "Young Dr. Kildare" series will do a Western episode entitled "Have Erysipelas, Will Travel."

Frank Sinatra, Peter Lawford, Dean Martin, Sammy Davis Jr. and others of the clan will do a roundtable panel discussion of David Susskind.

The New York theatre will fold. Immediately thereafter there will be a booking jam.

Roger L. Stevens will resuscitate the New York theatre. Critical opinion will be divided.

A fortune-telling act on the French circuit, circa 1555.*

Argentina's Oil Boom & Show Biz

By NID EMBER

Buenos Aires.

"La Dolce Vita" has reached Comodoro Rivadavia, most southerly straggly and struggling Argentine oiltown, where hitherto life has been rugged, men are men, and women . . . at a premium.

Formerly "Comodoro" was little more than a name, hard to pronounce after several "claritos" at a cocktail party. The climate is as tough as the surrounding Andean range can make it, with wind always howling down from the mountains, or up from the Atlantic seas.

Originally Comodoro was a port, from which wool sailed up to distant Buenos Aires, from immense surrounding sheep farms, run by dour Scots or unlettered Welsh settlers. Then oil became a Comodoro staple, inefficiently extracted by the State oil organization. Farmers hate the thought of finding oil on their land, as this doesn't mean wealth Texas-wise, but on the contrary, State expropriation against indifferent "compensation."

Neither sheepmen nor oilmen did anything to improve amenities in the primitive port town. The scanty residents' one thought has always been to make coin fast and get the blazes out of Comodoro.

Around two years ago, however, the 60-year-old city began to buzz with Yank oilmen, as the Frondizi government admitted foreign capital exploitation of oil deposits. Subsequently Comodoro teems with Argentines, Yanks, Chileans and Germans, all eager to make money fast, and vieing for the few hotel beds, and the favors of the few women. Rumor reached B. Aires that a "white slave" traffic was in full blast down there, and Yank oilworkers, far from abandoned wives, were said to be seeking divorces to marry the Comodoro floozies.

They're On Own

As usual rumor exaggerated: most of the nitery hostesses buy their own trips down, and seek jobs once they get there. Probably they "retire" after a couple of years, considerably richer and certainly wiser. Some do have their passages paid, but the girls are at liberty to leave when they wish, though niteries are strict about schedules, they can't leave until closing time, which is usually 4 a.m.

The city—or town—is now surrounded by shantytowns, as the population has spread well beyond the original 57,000. The "villas miseria" are mainly inhabited by transient Chilean workers. Board and lodging are at a premium for everyone, and youngsters who believe they are going down to earn "fabulous" pay, find it all goes on mere accommodation. American firms provide housing for their workers and explovees in prefabs, quonset huts or trailers. Entrepreneurs have ambitious building plans, mostly still in planning state, due to excessive bureaucratic delays. However, Comodoro is bound to grow in a big way, and especially to become an important entertainment market.

Room and pseudo-private bath in the "best" hotel, costs around $7 a day, a shoeshine costs 80c. At the start the Yanks were rooked for everything, particularly drinks in bars and niteries, but they are now considerably wised up.

It would be easy to say there is no social life, but the American wives and few secretaries get together for bridge teas etc. and a small Bill's Bar provides a "family" meeting place, as does the Hotel Colon for occasional meals away from home. Entertainment—of its kind—plays an important role due to the number of bachelors and married men with families some place else. The Grand Hotel Tearoom is a spot where "bien" (nice) girls and boys go; an orchestra, Los Cometas, plays soft swing music, while the girls look at the boys and the boys pretend to look elsewhere.

At present there are two film theatres (plus two on YPF camps, which are for oilworkers only). The large and modern Coliseo (Roque Gonzalez) seats 1,400 and has a coffeeshop in the mezzanine. This firm evidently finds exhibition good business, as it is building another larger film theatre. A distinctly expurgated version of "La Dolce Vita" (Church interference) had got to Comodoro by last October, but so much cutting had been done, the picture was almost unrecognizable. The first film theatre the town had, Espanol, is an 800-seat joint, also owned by Roque Gonzalez.

Of the niteries, the Folies Bergere is in a basement and far too large for sophisticated customer taste, as it's rarely full and lacks the intime atmosphere necessary for success. The hostesses also are somewhat of the rowdy type. Pseudo-Scotch costs around $2 a shot if the customer is alone, but he must pay double if one of the gals sit with him to drink weak tea disguised as liquor, which costs like gold. These prices include the cost of the "show," mostly engaged in B. Aires by owners who make frequent trips in search of talent. If one listens to the master of ceremonies, all the shows are "imported," but mostly the talent is local, with a plethora of "Spanish" dancers, singers, etc. This year Comodoro had one attraction in Javanese singer Kovi Novi, who did imitations of practically every musical instrument, the clack of castanets, or bird cries. No one understood how so good a turn had got there.

Most attractive of the nite spots is the Moulin Rouge, which has three bars, growing in intime quality with the gradation in prices of the drinks, the bars run by the most winning of all the hostesses. The M.R. owners were killed this year in a plane crash and it's feared the place may lose its charm under a new management.

The "Gruta" (Grotte), operated by a Sr. Lucas, is the most popular nitery, has two bars in a Jean-Paul Sartre type of cave decor.

The Bagatelle has three bars and unusually attractive hostesses. Congo is in one of the poorer neighborhoods, near a redlight district, catering to a rough clientele.

The newest joint is the Bar Americano, badly located and trying to make a good job of a bad start. More nightclubs are opening near the American encampments, one pueblito, Caleta Olivia, about 100 kms south of Comodoro, has four niteries, all doing roaring business.

All these joints tend to produce monstrous bills for new Yank customer faces, but only the new arrival lets himself get stuck; most are a tough bunch of Texans it's best to keep on the right side of.

Large industries are growing up around Comodoro, big petrochemical plants, textile mills, etc. Canneries and fishing industries are also a certainty in the near future, so any embryo Ziegfeld looking for new fields to conquer could do worse than take some capital and get started near the very tail end of Argentina.

Likes And Dislikes of Spaniards

By JOAQUINA CABALLOL

Barcelona.

Whatever the plot, the presentation, the star or the prucess, the Spanish audience undoubtly goes big for pictures. It is usual to hear people complaining about the quality of the feature when they leave the house, but that does not mean that that same person will not go back to the theatre as soon as the program changes.

Besides the 28 firstrun houses and 68 second runs in the Barcelona area, new houses are being built constantly. Also two legit theatres have become cinemas during last season the Novedades and Comedia in the heart of the city, and the Roma is likely to fall any day. Two new houses are being built, belonging to impresario Pedro Balana who owns a chain of seven first run houses in town, with capacity over 2,000 seats.

Films are considered a "need" and people go as routine. Some every day, others three times a week and others once a week, rain or sunshine, they must go to the "cine" as it is called here.

What Audiences Like

Barcelona audiences enjoy "well-dressed drama." Westerns with plenty of action, but turn up their noses to what is called here "tunic" pictures, of which they have had too many. Mass audience which does not make much distinction between a Roman or an Egyptian, has decided to name those big, more o. less historical epics "tunic" films, which do not offer enough interest for their simple imaginations and cannot live up to the reactions of the characters presented. Highbrows simply turn their backs on the Sandal epics. On the other hand they tend to too long, over three hours often, for local sitting capacity.

When the plot is a modern date affair it is easier to follow and to understand. Mass audiences prefer a two feature program to a three hour pic. They believe that they get more for the price.

Fastidious audiences who go to "premieres," are not enthusiastic either of the long feature, they have been deceived too often and are scared when told to be "punctual." Besides this class of people are more cultured and tremble at the way History is interpreted. There has not been much luck in the productions shot in Spain by American producers ever since Stanley Kamer came over to make "The Pride and The Passion." After this which greatly disappointed came "Solomon and Sheba" which even Yul Brynner could not save. "The Colossus of Rhodes" and "King of Kings", have not received a very warm welcome.

Supremacy of U.S. Pix

Looking at facts, however, the result is that American pix still hold the supremacy among audiences since the longest runs during the 1960-61 season have been of seven American features besides the most surprising success of the GWTW reissue which ran during 17 weeks at the Comedia blocking all dates.

European product is undoubtly good in many instances but does not appeal so much to the mass audience as American product. American stars are better known, are more publicized and very often when a new actor or actress apears for the first time in a pic, they are already known through fan mags, and stories which have appeared in weeklies and even in the cinema page of some dailies. This is very important and European producers have not up to the present publicized their stars like Americans have, this being so much so that many European stars become popular once they have appeared in some American production. Gina Lollobrigida, Sophia Loren, Maurice Chevalier, to name only a few, have reached mass audience when appearing in American product. People enjoy more a pic when they know the star, it is like meeting an old friend.

Old American Comedies

The older generation remembers with nostalgia the American comedies of the first talking pix which contributed to bust American pix in Europe. Comedies with simple clean plots for all the family. The sex pic so much in vogue now displeases a great part of family picture goers, and those who don't worry about morals, very often don't understand the film. In real life it appears that no such troubled characters exist as those shown by the writers of the new wave and people consider it fatiguing to have to endure on the screen the whims and nonsense of those false characters.

But in spite of all these obstacles people keep going to see pix in the hope that the sexy phase will one day pass and clear the way for cleaner and better pix.

Barcelona Legit's S.O.S.

Barcelona.

New Director General for Cinema, Jesus Suevos, is taking concrete steps to offset the Barcelona legit decline over the past year, by laying the groundwork for a government subsidized National Theatre.

In cooperation with the Barcelona municipality, Suevos plans the inauguration of this new legit showcase to coincide with highlight festivities that annually mark Cataluna's Fiests de la Merced in late September of next year.

Show Biz in New Zealand

Films, Concerts, Touring Revues Did Excellently In 1961—But Disks Languish

By D. G. DUBBELT

Auckland, N.Z.

Touring revues of the pop-and-family variety, glossier imported shows, acts ranging from hypnotists to magicians, ballet, grand opera, musicals, straight plays and, more recently, television in three of the country's four biggest cities all made a hard play for the nation's entertainment attention and money but in New Zealand's 1961 show business motion pictures still maintained its traditional lead.

Big thinking has charaterized Robert Kerridge since he erected his nation-wide film empire back in the 1940s from a modest provincial circuit. Year's most spectacular showing example of this spirit.

Kerridge is also the country's largest concert promoter and imported from Russia the 52-strong Leningrad Ballet. He also booked Todd Duncan, Anna Russell, Lonnie Donegan, etc.—Teenage appeal packages were handled by youthful promoter Harry Miller who set his own pace with Connie Francis, Jimmie Rodgers and the Everly Brothers. Even so the year's biggest noise in that area was made by the five-city tour, under the Kerridge banner, of English rockster Cliff Richard—second here to Elvis Presley.

Neat live show feat was pulled off by Australian promoter Harry Wren, who toured two vaude shows, cleaning up both times. In the face of earlier New Zealand downbeat revue biz, Wren's clicks left many Kiwi showmen agog.

But if the flickers were buoyant and the live side breezy, the same could not be said for the disk business. Hit hard by a trading recession, retail sales dropped and distributors swapped some of the smaller labels with a "Here, you take it!" air. All felt the impact of the British E.M.I.-sponsored World Record Club so strongly that most, in one way or another, got into the act too. Even cutrate disks were not selling well, however, and at least one club, owned by Australia's Consolidated Newspapers, folded before the year was out.

Television

Until now, video has been State-controlled, but from April next it will be administered by an independent commission, rather like the British B.B.C. Advertising time will still be sold, but no program will be "sponsored." Also, the way will be opened for private interests to own and operate their own tv stations and networks.

Little short of phenomenal has been the continued growth of nightspots in Auckland, the country's largest city, despite the ban on alcohol. (Officially, that is. Patrons still smuggle it in, disguised as Coke, with everybody taking the risk on a raid—rather like the old Prohibition days in the U.S.) One result of this boom has been the demand for entertainers, many of whom are now full-time professionals—a rarity in this country not many years ago. Until the lifting of the liquor ban (a licensing scheme is currently under review) it is unlikely that any hostelry will be able to afford to import overseas acts, although visiting artists sometimes work a night spot after their stage show. Some of the home-grown acts have worked overseas, some successfully, but only one registers as having the oomph to make it in the Yank big time: the Howard Morrison Quartet, an all-Maori vocal group with a musical and stage savvy that would make them a standout in any company.

Austrian Films: For Germany

By EMIL MAASS

Vienna.

Wien Film's studios here were rented solidly through 1961 and advance space reservations are substantial. New stereo sound apparatus enhances its facilities appeal. This studio was rented by Walt Disney for "Vienna Choir Boys" film and by director John Huston for his Austrian location work on "Freud." Latter's for Universal with Montgomery Clift, Sussanah York and Larry Parks in lineup.

French companies have included Films Matignon ("Duke of Reichstadt"), Film du Cyclope ("Le Caporal Epingle"). West Germany television shot Franz Lehar operettas at Wien. Austrian producers are showing "No Night Without Morning" (Schoenbrunn), "The Bat" (Sascha) and "Please Lie to Me" (Excelsior).

Austrian features no longer are competitive in export. The chiefs of every company make this clear. Export is too risky.

American participation in the Austrian market rose from 31.3% to 41.2% and might reach 50% in a year or so. This figure does not include the oldies, which did in many cases better business than the new ones. For the year 1962 not less than 181 American titles were registered here. Vienna itself broke all records, in 107 houses 1.570 films were shown. "Windjammer" in the Gartenbau Kino and "Ben-Hur" in the Tabor Kino scored despite the fact, that practically every visitor complained about the length and the rather uncomfortable seats.

Germany Bosses

West Germany's distributors, as heretofore, finance Austrian productions, the state guaranteeing also a certain sum, thus no risk to producer at all.

Admission in Vienna cinemas is up an average of 30%. Socialist as well as even the ultra-capitalistic newspapers were unanimous in their condemnation, all asking where did all that money go during the boom days? The answer is easy. It was spent for personal use and not one cent laid aside. In general, the admission raise was accepted as a fait accompli, just another proof of the growing inflation (same in U.S.—ed.).

There were several conferences to enact a uniform law on admission of juveniles, but no progress was made, the provinces insisting on autonomy as heretofore. A commission of five experts is working out a plan to mark motion pictures with "recommendations," valid in all provinces. Meanwhile the Constitutional Court of Austria cancelled a Salzburg law, which imposed fines on films, that hurts ethical or religious feelings on the ground, that this is not clear enough wording.

TOP GERMAN AUTHOR TURNS TO FILM PROD.

Berlin.

Heinrich Boell, 44 years of age and postwar Germany's most successful writer (his books have been translated into 18 languages), has gone into the German film business. Boell's book, "The Bread of Former Years," is currently being filmed in West Berlin.

It looms as an unusual production. "Bread" is being shot without dialog. Director Herbert Vesely and Boell have agreed that the author will write all dialog after the shooting has been completed. Boell has been given the privilege of giving the final okay on the film. Vesely, an avantgardist short film producer, is directing the film his first directorial assignment of a feature pic.

Cast of "Bread" is composed of relatively unkown players. There are only five principal players, Christian Doermer, Vera Tschechowa, Karen Blanguernon, Eike Siegel and Gerry Bretscher.

MADRID'S SHOW BIZ RESOURCES

By HANK WERBA

Madrid.

The 400th anniversary of Madrid, celebrated this year with fanfare in the Spanish capital city, is a mere historical drop in the bucket when seen in relation to the B.C. Roman Aqueduct at Segovia 60 miles out of town, or to nearby Toledo—flourishing throne seat of Alfonso VII back in the 12th Century. Madrid was late aborning, slow to develop and looked upon as a country-seat upstart by such lordly townships as Barcelona, Valencia, Seville, Granada, Toledo, Segovia and Leon. Yet, four centuries after its birth, Madrid emerges as Spain's most heavily populated city (2,000,000), Spain's geographical hub fully dominating the Iberian Peninsula and as Spain's most modern, bright and cheerful metropolis.

There is little doubt the town secretes a kind of even-tempered, casual, cosmopolitan good-naturedness that marks it as one of the friendliest and most comfortable on the continental circuit.

Equally beguiling to tourists and to foreign residents based here are the enduring provincial overtones that seem to hold off the disturbing impact of troubling times and the tense tempo of modern life.

For added color, Madrid is the melting pot for every oddball strain imaginable—Moorish and Jewish, the gypsy as differentiated from the Andalucian, the Iberian as distinguished from the Basque and a potpourri of regional shadings that have filtered into the Castilian blood stream to distinguish local inhabitants as Madrilenos and Madrilenas.

All this and a low cost of living has put Madrid on the tourist map with no less an influx than close to 2,500,000 visitors last year. TWA reports a 38% passenger increase this year for the tourist season that starts annually with the Easter Week hooded processions and the Seville Fair and lasts well into November.

On a short drive in from the airport, the average comment is "Why, it looks like Southern California." In quick succession comes the observation that Madrid has as much modern housing as any city in the world. The latter is more to the point for in the last five years the city has literally mushroomed from the confines of Paseo de la Castellana, the Bullring, the Royal Palace and City University to double its housing capacity and merge into outlying suburbs. Extent and speed of this growth in a land of timeless ones defies rationalization.

American Air Force Part Of the Population Explosion

Partial explanation is the presence of Uncle Sam on Spanish soil. The Air Force population alone is reported to be approximately 25,000, while Yank tourists in transit reached 200,000 in the past year. Besides, Madrid has played an important role over the same short period of five years as an active re-location center for Hollywood abroad.

The distinction must be drawn between those based here and the average American vacationer. The latter is thrilled to the marrow with toros and flamenco. The former is hip to toro caste and torero talent and catches the finger-snapping, heel-stomping local ballet art at the Zambra, El Duende, Corral de la Moreria and Torres Bermejas. Solid aficion (a native definition for good taste) comes only with time and maturity which a Madrid-by-night excursion (half a dozen cabarets in three hours) could not possibly inspire.

With the growing effort to probe beyond the obviously typical, more and more of Madrid's native rituals are being brought to light. Chief among these, is the "let's talk it over" gathering, known here as the "pena." Every cafe worth its name has one. Perhaps the most prominent here is the Pena Valentin where the most representative figures—literary, legit, fourth estate, cinema and art—meet weekly at this chic showbiz eatery where Felix is host. Cafe Gijon has several "penas" going at the same time (mostly art and theatre) every day in the week. There are thousands of these gab fest groups all over town, assembled before or after the sacred siesta to give each member the fraternal sense of belonging. In short, conversation is the champion mass form of entertainment.

Next in popularity is the European version of football. World champion Real Madrid has stirred millions of Castillians to a frenzy reminiscent of the best years at Ebbetts' Field. The Real Madrid football stadium holds 125,000 with empty tiers rarely in evidence for home games. It is not surprising that the sports sheet "Marca" claims the biggest circulation in Madrid.

Bullfighting Addicted to The Scalping of Its Buffs

Though bullfighting is gradually outpricing itself for the 10 best rows at Madrid's 25,000-seat Plaza de Ventas arena, Castillians continue to fill the bleachers every Sunday from May to September. The genuine bullfighting fever comes in mid-May during Madrid's own San Isidro holidays. This is the only time of the year when Yank tourists compete with locals for the $5 to $10 seats at ringside to watch the best taurine cards of the year. Except for a reduced number of special programs and charity events, the Sunday matinee bullfight (usually made up of three-year bulls and lustreless cape artists) depends principally on tourists for a profit-taking gate. A word of advice to Madrid-bound travellers: the Ventas arena on an ordinary Sunday afternoon is not the best place for a first sampling of blood and sand. Any hotel concierge can recommend a worthwhile corrida in one of the nearby cities or provinces.

Tasca-hopping is another favorite pastime. This is a ritual that starts out with vino and hors d'oeuvres over the counter and continues through the cafes of old Madrid until the point of no return is reached. Other favorite alleys for this type of standup on-the-town feedbag are the Calle Echegaray and the Plaza Santa Ana. All these sectors are colorful, noisy and filled with the music of strumming guitars and the improvised flamenco rhythm of gypsy minstrels.

Whether you are looking for a medieval shoe-horn or a modern madonna, the chances are you will find it at the Rastro, old Madrid's sprawling SRO Sunday morning flea market. Here, the art of reproducing antique jewellry, furniture, maps and paintings has reached a new high. Even the Guides look the other way when the hustling arcade tradesmen offer up El Puente de Toledo (Toledo Bridge) for a song. Nonetheless, the flea market has a Sunday morning panorama the "unitiated" should see—even at the risk of having to discard fraudulent originals later.

While the living is easy for residents and exciting for newcomers, the local showbusiness contours cannot be compared to those of Paris and London. The moral standards of the regime have been adapted with rigor to all of the commonly accepted forms of entertainment. Madrid strikingly lacks a permanent opera, a stimulating musical calendar and practically any form of modern ballet distinct from the local flamenco variety. There are no foreign-language movie houses. Few art films get by the censor. And little thought is given towards slanting entertainment for foreign consumption. On the other hand, Madrid can proudly point to its Prado, one of the world's top art museums, innumerable cafe terraces, siesta-breaks, numerous holidays, year-round sunshine and no pressure to keep the appointed hour.

Moral Conservatism Restrains Comparisons With Paris

Make no mistake, entertainment is plentiful. There are some 20 motion picture showcases along the main stem Gran Via, and almost as many of the off-stem variety. For instance, three Cinerama programs each held to excellent trade for a full calendar year at a first-run house most foreigners couldn't find without a guide. Metro's "Ben-Hur" held for 40 weeks at a house tucked away in a quiet little plaza, and United Artists' "The Alamo" did staggering trade at a salle a kilometer from main street.

Movie-going, once a gold-lined habit, still makes for block-long queues on weekends, but has gradually yielded ground to cafe television and the accessibly-priced motor scooter. Uniformly reliable warm weather air-conditioning even in first-run houses charging top price of 65c for the best film show in town (b.o. scales have been frozen by the Government since 1956) cannot yet be reported.

Legit is part of the Madrid scene. Houses like the Teatro Maria Guerro, Teatro Espanol (both state subsidized) Luis Escobar's Teatro Eslava, Comedia, Infanta Isabel and the newcomers of recent years such as Recoletos, Teatro Goya and Beatriz are all part of an undying tradition that will be hypoed this year with the opening of two modern theatres—Teatro Bellas Artes and Teatro Torre de Madrid. Nor do locals fail to support the music halls and vauderies well represented over the years by the ricketry but colorful Teatro Calderon, Fuencarral, La Latina, Teatro Martin and at least a half dozen others.

Class inns, such as the Ritz, Palace, Castellana-Hilton, Fenix, Suecia, Plaza, Wellington and others, are following the international trend of being identifed with the people who run them. At the Ritz, Carmen Guerrerdiain is as much a public figure as members of the Franco Cabinet. In her charming, gentle manner she has resisted the incursion of film celebrities to give her hostelry the subdued hollowness of a Tibetian sanctuary. She will frankly admit that neither BB, MM nor any of filmdom's headlined notoires will get past the reception desk while she still draws breath. There is no ban, however, on film stars dining at the Ritz or in the summer season Ritz Gardens—one of the loveliest olde world settings for al fresco dining in Spain.

The Hotels Display Up-to-Date Boniface Showmanship

Alberto Font runs the terminal-sized Palace Hotel like a three-ring circus master. The Palace has modernized its chambres but has wisely refrained from tinkering with its Vienna-like lobby and spacious dome-topped salon of distinguishedly old fashioned and gracefully dix-neuvieme siecle. Font really deserves a bow for his Grill Room with its unparalleled cuisine and impeccable service.

The Castellana-Hilton is a miniature version of the George V in Paris and the Excelsior in Rome. The foundation of this edifice has been slowly sinking for the past five years and hectic efforts are being made to keep it at ground level for future generations of Yank tourists who find bell captain Alfredo and his bilingual staff indispensable in fathoming the historical and monumental riches of Castile. Like the George V and the Excelsior, Hilton's Castellana is a film industry beehive. It is also a catering place for oil, real estate, Air Force brass and the American Club. Spanish is spoken here in hushed tones, if ever. Nevertheless, you can get a comfortable single room for $7 or less, and an express lunch in the palatial dining room for $2, tip and wines included.

A host of new eateries have sprung up to compete for the Yankee dollar and tourist boom trade from England and the Continent without in any way affecting the popularity of such long-standing favorites as the Jockey Club, Horchers, Commodore, Valentine and Botin. The first four are the chi-chi darlings of Texas oilionaires and celebs. Botin, on the other hand, is the moderately-priced standby with a waiting line dating back to the early 18th century.

Cuisine connoisseurs now give as much frequency to newcomers Club 31, Hotel Suecia's Belmian and Casanova—show biz haunts with "don't miss" ratings.

The Culinary Versatility Of Madrid Fully Demonstrated

Because Madrid is dead center kilometer zero, it is approvisioned with Spain's choicest sea-food trucked in daily from both Atlantic and Mediterranean fishing ports. Among the deep-sea delicacies unfamiliar to the American palate are October-to-April tid-bits ranging from barnacles and toothpick-sized baby eel to squid in its own ink and octopus rings. Though underwater life and gruntins are served in most restaurants and bistros, Old Madrid's Hogar Gallego is best known for its unlimited variety.

A roll-call of steak-houses automatically includes Alabrasa and El Rancho Tranquilino (both featuring succulent Argentine specialties) and the more moderately-priced but very popular Casa Paco—a sirloin tasca in the old quarter.

In the wake of the tourist upsurge, the regional eateries—Gure Toki and Casa Vasca for the Basque, La Masia for the Catalans, La Barraca for Levantine paella, etc.—now face competition from a rash of newcomers featuring foreign wares. Among these are the pasta palaces like Luigi's in town and Casa Napolitana ten miles out on the highway to France; Yatel who single-handedly has upheld the high standards of good French cooking; the gland-warming menus of Mexico at El Charro and Mexico Lindo; the Hotel Suecia's once-a-week (Thurs. only) parade of smorgasbord, shashlick-shakers at the Bosforo and a sprinkling of Chinese and German (particularly the Edelweiss) restaurants.

By resisting the temptation of such top-tab items as smoked salmon and lobster, the gourmet can get the best for as little as $5 per meal including a good brand of vino. But there are many bistros, taverns and tascas, including Botin, Hogar Gallego, Paco's and many others, where la nota is half that amount.

After-dinner fun and flamenco are most often synonymous. Despite the apparent monotony of the native song and footbeat, the standpat Corral, Duende and newcomer Torre Bermejas get the bulk of foreign residents and oriented tourists. The Zambra show is rated four-stars year after year for its uncompromising stress on flamenco as a Spanish art form rather than as a modified entertainment for tourist digestion.

Though the long hand of the regime makes it compulsory to program native folklore in the score or more of non-flamenco boites, bonifaces at Pasapoga, Bigmbo Chino, Morocco, Michaleta, Casablanca, Flamingo, Rex and the Alcazar still manage to incorporate international acts which give the late spenders a choice of spectacle imported from South and Central America, the Continent, Middle-East and, once in a rare while, from the U. S. A.

Yank acts are more of a minority than ever since the recent AGVA ruling that dollar fees to performers had to be banked in escrow prior to actual engagement.

Most of the cabarets around town are dissimulated fleshpots. The oldest profession in the world, once organized as a separate sphere of entertainment, was shrouded in illegality some years ago with a consequent shift of this segment of the female population to the niteries. Some of these Spanish gals has have contributed to the fame of well-known spots like Riscal and Chicotes. Riscal's popular boniface, Alfredo Camorra, likes to think of them as courtesan playmates but he also makes it clear that he serves the best paella in town at what has been known for many years as a meeting-place for the seven lively arts as well as for Madrid's most notorious playboys.

The Spanish capital city is on a consistently upbeat drag as a conspicuous anchor of the London-Paris-Rome axis. For the moment, it could almost hold its own as a tourist beacon with any city on the Continent. In its 400 brief years Madrid has become a sun-splashed metropolis, sans cardiacs, with a tempo that excludes the worry and fear harassing the minds of men in other principal cities of the world.

Vet Stage Manager On Show Biz Jinxes

By BOB DOWNING

As a youngster in the stocks, reps and showboats of the midwest, I heard most of the catalog of superstitions that showfolk mention. I can substantiate the yarn that green is widely considered a bad luck color. We had a set designer with the Boyd D. Trousdale Players in Des Moines circa 1932) who would not put green any place on stage, and who had hysterics if any of the actors wore green. I got the impression he was the last of an apostolic succession of stagers who cultivated this notion. I wonder why? I soon learned it was a global superstition.

In a dressingroom, the actor's trunk placed nearest the door by the propman (when trunks were delivered to the dressingrooms) was said to be in danger of being the next person to lose his job in the case.

Picking up pins backstage is also one of Lynn Fontanne's pet superstitions. She will sometimes engage in this activity onstage during a scene if she spies a pin on the floor. She also has an abhorrence of passing anyone on stairs backstage, and will go back to the top or down to the bottom of a flight to avoid this if the person approaching appears unwilling to retreat.

One never signs contracts, starts tours, or opens shows on Friday if it can be avoided. I might add that almost every contract I have ever signed, by some peculiar coincidence, was signed on Friday. I consider it my good luck day, which is very contrary of me.

It is supposed to be good luck if it rains opening night. Well, it rained on the opening nights of almost all the hits I've ever been with, from "Streetcar" to the present ("Camelot").

Nuns in the audience are supposed to presage bad luck. Priests, good luck. On stage, nuns are obviously the best of luck (witness "Sound of Music," etc.).

It is considered by many performers, particularly in variety and circus fields, to be good luck to touch the hump of a hunchback. In fact, dwarfs, hunchbacks and midgets have been mascots of many shows for reasons of "luck."

Concerning "Macbeth", many dramatic actors consider it bad luck to quote from the play.

As for talking to an actor in the mirror while he is making up, I have heard the superstition; but nearly every star I know prefers to chat this way with a caller while making up: Lunt, Fontanne, Merman, Mae West, Julie Andrews, to cite examples.

Cats in theatres are lucky; bats are not uncommon; but a bird in a theatre can strike terror to certain superstitious hearts. This is not strictly theatrical. A bird in a house is supposed to presage a death in the house. I speak, of course, of a bird that has flown into the house and a caged bird.

Many theatre people believe it is bad luck to leave the theatre by any other entrance than the one through which you entered. This belief, too, is known outside the theatre. Some people believe if a person enters your home through one door, leaves by another, he will not return.

Lucky costumes, props, types of makeup are almost too familiar to itemize.

TIARA TAHITI

Two Englishmen whose civilian and military careers clashed violently, meet again in Tahiti of today. James Mason: late socialite adventurer, gone native and John Mills his ex business junior and former commanding officer—now self-made tycoon. An Ivan Foxwell production in color with Herbert Lom, Claude Dauphin and introducing volcanic Rosenda Monteros in an eruption of intrigue, suspense, humor and sex.

IN THE DOGHOUSE

The British love animals, indigenously called 'our dumb friends'. In producer Hugh Stewart's hilarious havoc, animal doctors Leslie Phillips and James Booth discover that man's best friend is often the dog's owner—and she's not always dumb! Talking of pets, Peggy Cummins trains animals including humans and Hattie Jacques lends her full weight to the craziest British comedy of the year.

ALL NIGHT LONG

The tension-riddled story of a night of jazz, love, hate and jealousy. A Bob Roberts production starring Patrick McGoohan, Keith Michell, Betsy Blair, Paul Harris, Marti Stevens and Richard Attenborough. Produced by Michael Relph and directed by Basil Dearden (who made 'Victim'). Dave Brubeck and Charlie Mingus join forces with other top jazzmen playing in a jam session of human emotions.

A PAIR OF BRIEFS

Disorder in court turns into a riot when talented counsel is young, beautiful Mary Peach (of 'No Love for Johnnie' fame). The judge is James Robertson Justice, and Brenda de Banzie plays the fortunate victim of an unsavory divorce case—thanks to the unwitting help of Michael Craig, Ron Moody and Liz Fraser. A legal romp from Betty Box and Ralph Thomas.

DER ROSENKAVALIER

From producer-director Dr. Paul Czinner, who recorded for all time 'The Bolshoi Ballet' and 'The Royal Ballet', now comes the colorful, never-to-be-forgotten production in full of Richard Strauss' world-famous opera. Starring Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Sena Jurinac, Anneliese Rothenberger, Otto Edelmann and Erich Kunz, it renders the authentic atmosphere of the Salzburg Festival with Herbert von Karajan conducting.

BIG STARS MAKE THE MOVIES MOVE IN BRITAIN!

Hear that clicking? That's the sound of countless ticket machines all over the world punching out admission tickets for top British Movies. Take, for example, the latest Associated British hit, "The Young Ones" The star of this spectacular song and star packed musical is 21 year old Cliff Richard Britain's top singing idol with a following of millions of teenage fans.

Equally responsible for the wear on ticket machines is Britain's funniest comedian, Charlie Drake. This well-loved comic now stars in a hilarious movie called "Petticoat Pirates" which sets out to show what might happen when Wrens (lady sailors) take charge of a battleship. Charlie, heavily disguised as a Wren, provides most of the belt-busting belly laughs of this nautical romp.

Or perhaps you prefer your comedy in the relaxed manner. If so, there's none more suave than Dave King, who provides ninety minutes of effortless mirth in "Go to Blazes"; a story of petty crooks who use a fire engine as a getaway car only to get involved in fighting fires.

Shaws Vs. Cathay In Malaya

awards receiving the honor for Best Film plus 11 additional awards.

The Shaws are hard-workers like most Chinese. When Masaichi Nagata, President of Daiei, Japan, mooted the idea of forming a Federation of Motion Picture Producers in Asia to organize and hold annual film festivals in Asia, Run Run Shaw gave him the fullest possible support and closely identified himself with the Asian Film Festivals from their conception some seven years back.

A Chinese film "Yang Kwei Fei" a coloured coproduction by Messrs. Masaichi Nagata and Run Run Shaw—was released in Paris.

Today under the Shaw banner are shown pictures produced in India, Pakistan, Japan, Taiwan, the Philippines, Thailand, South Vietnam and Indonesia plus the U.S., the U.K., Europe and the Middle East.

Run Run Shaw's latest participation at the Cannes Film Festival was his Chinese production "L'Ombre Enchanteresse" in eastmancolor, starring Betty Loh Tih.

Shaws also operates its own self-contained equipment department which imports all latest cinematograph equipment, embracing screens, theatre supplies, chairs, generator sets, lighting and so on.

Shaw Printing Works is another subsidiary to ensure self-sufficiency in the printing of advertising materials, posters, leaflets, booklets etc. to take care of their vast commitments.

Shaws besides, publishes four national film magazines, the English Movie News, and Chinese, Malay and Indian movie magazines circulated all about South-East Asia.

Property and Real Estate Department lists and manages the choice properties owned by Runme Shaw and Run Run Shaw in Hong Kong, Singapore, the Federation of Malaya, British North Borneo and in other territories.

Cathay Coming Up

In ferocious competition with Shaws' Brothers is, of course, the Cathay Organization which in 1957 launched a $3,400,000 U.S. ($10,000,000 Malayan) scheme of building new cinemas within two years throughout Singapore, Malaya, Sarawak and Borneo. Its chairman Dato Loke said his company was looking for expansion in his part of the world. He told VARIETY (in his air-conditioned office at Cathay Building) that he was fully aware of competition from Shaws which was all the more reason why Cathay sought a great expansion scheme.

"No business can afford to stand still. We don't look back but we must go about things with caution. Besides, here is the slow process of evolution."

Cathay, he stated, has 60 cinemas, one in Bangkok, the rest in Malaya, Singapore and the Borneo territories. Two months ago it added two more theatres to its circuit of first-run houses throughout South-East Asia. A significant task was the 1,123 seat New Boonpang Theatre in Brunei where as cinemas went, a thousand seater was quite a thing. Opened Sept. 20, it is drawing crowds today.

Cathay has signed with K. Asif, producer of the US $2,000,000 Indian epic film "Mughal-E-Azam," a contract here for its release in Singapore, Malaya and Sarawak. Brunei and North Borneo. This picture has been shown in Bombay where it has netted US $8,000,000!

Cathay also recently went into co-production work with Precitel of France and Da Ma Cinematographic of Rome for an original screen play "Cast the Same Shadow" by Malayan writer, Han Suyin of "Love is a Many-Splendoured Thing" fame. Shooting has begun in Cambodia where the love tale is based. Joint producers are Pierre Courau of Precitel and Tom Hodge of Cathay-Keris Films.

Story tells of adolescent love and conflicting cultures in post-war Cambodia. It portrays the trials and tribulations of two young lovers—Sylvie, of French stock, and Rahit, a young Cambodian. Director is Andre Michel who has won the Grand Prize for the Best Short-Subject at the 1948 Venice Festival with "The Rose and the Minuet." Director of photography is Edmond Sechan.

"You may wonder why Cathay-Keris, a studio whose main occupation is the production of Malay language feature films, has signed a co-production agreement with a French company for a French-English language film for world exhibition. The reason is we need more money to put into making Malay films and we expect the arrangement to make a good profit for the Studio. "The Malay film business has always been highly unprofitable and the Studio lost over one and a half million dollars in its first eight years. The industry is new to the country, the domestic market is very small and now there is virtually no overseas market. We used to get about U.S. $17,000 for each film sold to Indonesia but today we are fortunate to receive $4,000 U.S. for each of the very few films we are permitted to sell there.

"The technical quality of Malay films has improved tremendously but even to maintain the audience we now have, we need to make better films. And better films cost more money."

'SUCCESS ON A HOT PLATTER'

It's What's In the Groove That Catapults Pop and Classic Artists to Fame

By GEORGE R. MAREK
(V.P. & G.M., RCA Victor)

Not too many years ago, Show Business was in a pickle. You could hear the agonizing cries, which echoed through the hectic halls of talent agencies, for miles. Tears were shed copiously by any 10%ers worth their slice. They had a problem: The slice—the sine qua non of agentry—was getting thinner. "Better," bleated one sect member during that time of crisis, "it should happen to my kids." It is unquestionable fact that rather than endure this indignity any handsome vant-to-talent would turn in his dark suit, horned-rims and quit.

The Slice was getting thinner because Talent, which is Show Biz's chief import, export, Only Commodity and total raison d'etre, was wasting on the vine. Tomorrow's Jolsons, Sinatras and Garlands, Comos and Carusos, Bings and Berles were in the wings, cooling their heels. Unpunched Meal Tickets. Where could they work out the raw kinks of their artistry? How was the public to know, even, that they were alive?

With vaudeville irretrievably committed to faded memory, burlesque gone the way of all flesh and nightclubs economically structured to sustain only Big Names, where, indeed, were the New Names to embryo? Where would talented youngsters neophyte for their Show Biz lives?

At the agencies, a new cliche was born. "Baby, you're great!" lyrics were told, "but where can we build you?" For these budding boffo headliners—historically the life-blood of the world of entertainment, which seemed to be suffering from a glaring case of varicose veins—were there no Canavs, crash, no launching pads? To their entrepreneurs, it seemed that way.

Even the Catskill Mountain plusheries tightened their borscht belts. The Catskills, perennial break-in Mecca for would-be, could-be stars, had become something less than Nirvana for the young professionals. Hotel owners there, who had, in the past, springboarded many a worthy on his way, were now building bigger and better nightclubs of their own, but signing only bigger and better attractions. Thus, in effect, they were beginning actually to compete with their brethren butterers to the south. The flow and/or turnover of young talent, so vital to Show Biz, was bottle-necking. The situation was getting sticky, panic was operating just around the corner and tranquilizers were booming.

The 'Answer'

Fortunately, however, the "answer" to the puzzlement was just around the corner, too.

The answer, I suggest rather strongly, was the phonograph record.

If the record industry must assume the responsibility for the allegedly lamentable state of popular music in America I don't happen to agree with this criticism then it must also assume the credit for developing the whole new generation of Show Business personalities. No fact of Show Biz is more obvious than that the disk is the one certain passport to international fame. Stars, traditionally "born" to their mantles, are now spun into being. Instead of wasting on the vine, they're zooming on vinylite.

The plethora of platter-made-and-developed talent includes such fresh headliners as Elvis Presley, Shelley Berman, Paul Anka, Bobby Darin, Bob Newhart, Ricky Nelson, Neil Sedaka, Chubby Checker, Brenda Lee, Fabian, Connie Francis, Ray Charles, Ann-Margaret, Brook Benton, Bobby Rydell, Anita Bryant, Pat Boone, Johnny Mathis, Guy Mitchell, Tony Bennett and Dick Gregory. For the Kingston Trio, The Limeliters, The Tokens and dozens of other vocal groups, success came on a hot platter. Al Hirt, television's ubiquitous trumpet giant, was launched with missile speed on a pair of bestselling albums.

I believe it is a mistake for many critics to characterize modern popular music—which has jetted so many youngsters to fame and fortune and stabilized The Slice, in the process—as merely congeries of caterwauling adolescents bereft of taste and deficient in talent. These pundits are unable to explain why the contemporary idiom of pop music has had such an unfailing and universal appeal. It literally amazes them that the talents of a Paul Anka, Connie Francis, Neil Sedaka or Johnny Mathis are in constant demand all over the world, for huge sums of hard cash. By closing their ears to the new sounds in popular music, perhaps they have also closed their eyes to the fact that the music evidently satisfies a deep emotional need in a way that the older forms no longer do.

But there is hope for the saltiest sages. One of our most esteemed music journalists and critics recently atoned for his earlier, rather low assessment of Elvis Presley by stating, in a syndicated column, that he'd changed his mind—or, rather, Elvis had changed it for him. There was much more to Mr. Presley, he now opined, than sideburns and undulation. This amazing phenomenon of the record industry was an artist, pure and true. With listening, I'm sure that similar defection in behalf of Presley's many contemporaries will shortly be commonplace.

What's in those vinylite grooves does as much for an artist as spreads in the most widely read national publications, and often leads to same. It is much the same on the Classical Music scene where celebrated divas like Callas, Tebaldi, Leontyne Price or the more recently adored and acclaimed Joan Sutherland are preceded in their glittering debuts by already-established and glowing reputations on records.

It is announced that a Russian pianist named Sviatoslav Richter will appear in concert at Carnegie Hall. The announcement is in the form of small ads taken in Manhattan newspapers. There is no contingent of press agents scurrying Richter's name into print. His arrival in this country goes comparatively unnoticed. Yet, he sells out Carnegie Hall. He then tours the United States and it's S.R.O. whenever he sits down to play. The same thing happens over and over again, with Emil Gilels, another great Soviet artist, or David Oistrakh, the violinist. In the vernacular of this journal, they "have arrived" before they actually arrive; they are "socko clicks" and "boffola at the boxoffice" before they sail by the Statue of Liberty. Thanks, it must be obvious by now, to that most useful harbinger—the phonograph record—they conquer before they do battle!

Thus, new names are created, developed and promoted, keeping the Entertainment World's pot boiling, and that worrisome Slice thick. Hollywood, television, niteries, and, once again, the Catskill spas are abounding in freshly sprouted, patiently nourished and patently professional talent.

Now, if we in the Record Industry only know where our next million-seller was coming from . . .

British Music and Disk Trades Reassert Lead Over U.S. Rivals

By ROGER WATKINS

London.

Apart from another boom year in the disk biz, the British music trade is particularly pleased about the fight back of home talent and with it the reappearance of the melody line. Publishers who suffered severely at the hands of imported rock 'n' roll, found that, last year, the going wasn't so tough.

As one executive puts it, even the American-owned publishers in Britain discovered that they could make more money in promoting British hits than importing the American ones. Of course, British shops needed only a little coaxing to adopt this view.

The songwriters Guild of Great Britain, also on a "Go British" kick, ceaselessly nagged the BBC about the "excess" of American music played on sound radio, BBC's monopoly. And an independent group, the Authors and Composers Representative Committee tried, unsuccessfully, to pressure the Performing Rights Society Britain's collecting agency) into demanding a high quota of British music from BBC.

Radio Census Now Shows British Plugs Top Yank

Some effects of the strong feeling in London's Tin Pan Alley on this subject seems to have reflected in the Corporation's radio programming. In the Current Items (newly-written music) domestic compositions are now topping U.S. songs. But the largest part of broadcast music is catalog material—and largely American. BBC-compiled figures for August 1961 illustrate this.

Some 1,872 current items were played that month of which 783 were American, 827 were British and 262 other foreigners. But the Corp. played 4,961 oldies of which 3,156 were U.S. songs and only 1,418 were native. Other foreign numbers amounted to 387. British songwriters and publishers are hopeful that, at last the U.S. grip on the British music trade has been loosened, though none would care to forecast it.

Of the whole trade, disking is one side that has no complaints. Despite a strictly bolt year in 1960 in which $42,000,000 went into manufacturers' pockets, last year is expected to top even that figure.

British Pop Stylists Share In The Comeback

Headed by two giants, Decca and EMI (Electric and Musical Industries)—which share 80% of the disk trade— all U.K. labels have been trying to establish British talent. By the end of last year, homeland thrushes gained 50% of the pop market and there were times when only one Yank singer figured in the U.K. top 10 disks. A year earlier, it was mostly the reverse, with only one non-American singer in the top charts. Anglo newcomers, improving on U.S. prototypes, now seem to make a silver disk with incredible ease. Helen Shapiro and Johnny Leyton are examples. Miss Shapiro won two silvers out of three numbers while Leyton has a score of 100%, two out of two.

During the year disk sales were helped (not that they necessarily needed it) by tv and film theme tunes. Leyton's initial number "Johnny Remember Me," was featured in Associated TeleVision's "Harpers West One" series and the disk was instantly in business. Several tv themes—"Sucu Sucu," "Coronation Street," "Rawhide" for instance—have made handsome returns. Cliff Richard, Helen Shapiro, Adam Faith disks all had boosts from feature films with noticeable success.

Most surprising success of the year was the rise of Matt Monro, whose balladeering earned him U.S. nitery dates. Along with the acceptance of Shirley Bassey (who also scored in the hit parade this year) and Frankie Vaughan, plus the fluke success of Lonnie Donegan's gimmicky "Does Your Chewing Gum Lose Its Flavor," record execs here say they have noticed a marked increase in American interest in British talent. Bookings in key U.S. cities have become easier to fix, they say.

Probably the most important trend for British musicians has been the development of traditional (Dixieland) jazz. Although this has not meant much diskwise, there are now a half-a-dozen trad bands making big money from fours abroad, radio, tv and concert dates. Scores more are making not-so-lean livings from clubs, fetes, etc.

Broadcasters have really caught the trad bug and slotted a whole lot of air time for the music. Now some sections of the trade feels the music is facing over-exploitation and will grind itself into the ground in a short time. Certainly, top-notch bands are few but, to the suggestion they are on the way out, they blow a very blue note.

The 3 Top Songs of All Time

By SIGMUND SPAETH

It is now a recognized fact that our popular songs provide the best possible index to the manners, customs and general characteristics of each generation of Americans, including even the clothes, the slang, the jokes and the current events of the day. But if one tries to select three or four numbers that have been sung more often than any others in our history, one is likely to find them all of the convivial type, having no topical significance, but definitely adapted to celebrations, occasions and anniversaries of all kinds, when people almost automatically break into song.

Such a list would not include any of the lyric inspirations of Stephen Foster, or "Home, Sweet Home," or "Dixie," or even "The Star-Spangled Banner," which is frequently played under compulsion, as our National Anthem (since 1931), but hardly ever sung by more than a solo voice.

Actually the song that has been heard most often in this country (and perhaps in Europe as well) is a simple, unpretentious little two-line ditty originally called "Good Morning to All." We knew it best as "Happy Birthday to You," but it can express equally well such a wish as "Happy New Year," "Merry Christmas" or even "Happy Anniversary." It was written in 1893 by two New York school teachers, the sisters Mildred and Patty Hill, and for many years it was believed to be a folk song and therefore "in the public domain." A number of people discovered this to be a costly error, including Irving Berlin, who quite innocently used the song in "As Thousands Cheer," to celebrate the birthday of John D. Rockefeller. It is now free to all, having long passed the copyright limit of 56 years, and will probably continue to be sung indefinitely at parties, in pubs and taverns, in restaurants, or wherever an anniversary of any kind may demand attention. Incidentally, "Happy Birthday" is generally pitched too high, since the singers forget about that octave jump in the middle. The key of G is about right for average voices.

Contesting first place today with the little birthday jingle, and perhaps the world's most popular tune for several centuries, is another convivial song, best known as "We Won't Go Home Till Morning" and "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow." Our Kiwanis and Rotary clubs have given it a nonsensical text of their own, beginning "The bear went over the mountain."

A certain William Clifton was responsible for the first of these American versions, described as a "Favorite Glee for Three Voices" and published in 1842, with a cover picture that fully justified the optimism of the title. Actually the familiar melody goes far back into European history and its exact origin has never been determined.

In France and England it was known as "Malbrouck" or "Malbrough" and apparently dealt with the Duke of Marlborough and his "famous victory" at Blenheim. (The French words concentrated on the phrases "Malbrough s'en va-t-en guerre, Ne sait quand reviendra.") But it has been argued that the music was known as early as the Crusades. Chateaubriand heard it sung by Arabs in Palestine and claims that it was brought there by Godfrey of Bouillon. Marie Antoinette is said to have used it as a lullaby for the infant Dauphin in 1781. Beaumarchais put the tune into his "Marriage of Figaro" three years later, which made it a favorite for local and topical parodies. Beethoven quoted it extensively in his "Battle Symphony" to represent the French troops.

Charles Dibdin, in his "Musical Tour" (1788), referred to "young ladies hammering Malbrouk out of tune." It appeared as an instrumental number in various violin and flute collections of the 18th century and also as a harpsichord lesson with variations. As late as 1867 an opera bouffe, "Malbrough," was based upon the song, with Bizet, Delibes and other composers contributing to the score. If one places the time even as early as the 18th century, when it was already universally popular, "Malbrough" may well have been sung and played more often than any other composition in all history.

'Auld Lang Syne'

To complete the top trio of all-time popular songs, the choice almost inevitably falls upon "Auld Lang Syne," again a symbol of conviviality, ideal for any occasion of nostalgic significance. It has long been the recognized theme song for New Year's Eve the world over, and it fits perfectly into any situation representing the end of a long association for a group of almost any kind, such as the actors in a successful play or the graduating class of a school or college.

Actually the melody of "Auld Lang Syne" has been used by a number of our educational institutions, including Vassar's "The Rose and Silver Gray." Many a Princetonian is unaware that this was the tune of his Alma Mater, "Old Nassau," before Karl Langlotz composed the original music sung today.

The phrase "Auld Lang Syne" is much older than the song itself in the language of Scotland. The text as we now know it is partly traditional and only partly by Robert Burns, who generally receives full credit for its creation. The original melody was an ancient strathspey, "I Fee'd a Lad at Michaelmas," and was also used for another old song, "The Miller's Wedding."

After selecting these three leaders in the popular music of the world, the choice becomes more difficult. Probably the melody we know as "America" would rank very high. Through the years it has quite possibly been sung more often than our National Anthem, because it is far more singable. It is well-known also as a hymn-tune, in addition to its official position in England and more than a dozen other countries and States. The melody is also very popular among American colleges and has been fitted to the words "So say we all of us" as a tag following "For He's a Jolly Good Fellow" and other convivial ditties. The music has been variously credited to Henry Carey and the fittingly named John Bull. The American words were written by Rev. Samuel Francis Smith in 1832 and introduced by Lowell Mason on July 4 of that year. Beethoven and Weber are among the composers who have used the melody instrumentally, and its popularity shows no sign of diminishing.

VARIETY All-Time Pop Standards

By ABEL GREEN

Columbia Records, which is packaging an "alltime hit parade" for one of its custom-made disk customers, brought to a head a tabulation VARIETY has been wanting to do for some time, but even now cannot be anything but inconclusive.

An attempt to alphabetize the following, as a sampling of what the music biz may least challenge is fraught with advance knowledge that the elements of omission and commission are ever-present for any number of realistic reasons. The realities of some new cycle in pop music can throw this roster awry. The current vogue of the Mitch Miller Sing-Along tv show, for example, has added countless added values, via performances, folios, revitalized disk sales and the like to a flock of dormant standards.

The current Twist craze, for example, must give the thematics of the Joey Dees and kindred exponents of the new dance wave immeasurable values in ASCAP and BMI performances, dancehall, nitery and disk assets.

So in order to appraise a "modern," i.e. 20th Century Hit Parade (and thus bypassing the mauve decade's Stephen Foster and kindred oldies) all those potentials are not to be ignored.

International Hit Paraders

Furthermore, such is the global impact of the pop music business today that, for example, a "Volare" of a few seasons back or a "Never On Sunday," as of now (incidentally, the first time a foreign, in this case Greek, song ever copped an Academy Award as the best motion picture song), must be reckoned with. In their concentrated performances, international recording versions, global performances and sales, in multiple languages, these add up to a quick fancy score that has taken most of the list herewith many accumulative years to achieve. So here goes for what is a sampling of an All-Time Hit Parade, with the advance knowledge—it should be established here quickly for the record and to forestall further footnoting—that some of these are "seasonal" songs. This means "Easter Parade," "Rudolph the Rednosed Reindeer," "White Christmas" and the like.

Smash Sales

Incidentally, the Columbia Records' custom department, in seeking the well-nigh impossible "Top Ten," wanted to rule out the seasonal smashes, such as the two Irving Berlin standards above which, according to a preliminary VARIETY survey, were high up there on performances and sales. As detailed in VARIETY recently, some 34,000,000 platters of "White Christmas," including Bing Crosby's own 29,000,000-sales mark, along with the 33,000,000 disks of "Rudolph," can't be ignored. Both, also, have enjoyed sales into the millions of pianoforte copies, multiple band and vocal arrangements, and the like. The Columbia Records' mapping of whatever package (for Goodyear Rubber) may emerge also put accent on "strictly popular" and not the seasonal or patriotic standards, such as John Philip Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever," Berlin's "God Bless America," Reginald DeKoven's "Oh Promise Me," Carrie Jacobs Bond's "I Love You Truly" both of which, along with Berlin's (there's that man again) "Always" are the staples at weddings and anniversaries.

Ingredients For Durability

The elements of what makes for "most popular" are frequently immeasurable, such as the mass appeal to the man-in-the-street (whistle while you work etc.), the accumulative millions of sheet music, the different folio and orchestral, vocal, band, barbershop quartet, choral and kindred arrangements; the countless radio performances by hinterland radio stations (not fully logged by either ASCAP or BMI for per-plug payoffs); and the general longevity of the copyright. Obviously, the older the tune, if it remains fresh in memory and enjoys repetitive renditions, the greater its values—performance income, record and music sales, synchronization and other mechanical reproduction usages, and the like.

It is generally conceded in that euphemistically orbit called Tin Pan Alley—no longer tinpanny nor an alley, nor has it been for decades—that "St. Louis Blues" and "Stardust" are neck-and-neck for the two most recorded pops. Each has some 800-900 different American disk versions, and their waxings by foreign artists, on global labels, also runs into scores of different interpretations.

Perennial Signature Songs

"Auld Lang Syne" gets repeated performance in niteries, dancehalls and for everything ranging from politico to sentimental occasions. FDR put "Home On The Range" on the musical map, and President Truman dittoed "The Missouri Waltz." New York Mayor Wagner's theme song is the "Carousel" excerpt by Rodgers & Hammerstein, "You'll Never Walk Alone," which is a favorite also at graduations and similar fraternal occasions, as is "Auld Lang Syne."

Coincidental with that are other important considerations — album anthologies; utilizations in motion pictures, video and radio either as "theme," atmospheric or period songs; and sheet music, song folio and orchestration sales. The last phase is minimal, in sharp contrast to another era when mechanical performance income was the by-product, and the fundamental business of music publishing and selling of copies was the prime source of revenue.

Today the recording is the kingpin of the business and the platter-chatterer (disk jockey) the prime purveyor and disseminator of music.

The galaxy spotlights a number of songs which survived flop shows and became perennials. "Begin The Beguine" and "Just One Of Those Things" meant little in the original "Jubilee," a moderately successful Broadway musical despite the fact that librettist Moss Hart and songsmith Cole Porter went on a round-the-world cruise to write it.

In the same idiom as "Jubilee," Berlin likes to point out that despite the cast presence of such musicomedy favorites as Marilyn Miller, Helen Broderick, Clifton Webb and Ethel Waters in "As Thousands Cheer," his 1933 Music Box Revue was chiefly panned for its score. "Heat Wave," "Not For All The Rice In China" and other tunes in his 14-song score were "liked" by the critics but eventually it was "Easter Parade" which survived as the standard.

Cole Porter's "Night and Day" dates back to the 1932 original stage source, "The Gay Divorce." When it was filmed later, Hollywood chose to add an "e" and the title became "Divorcee," and the tune has been an evergreen for virtually a third-of-a-century.

'Stardust' & 'St. Louis Blues'

Hoagy Carmichael's 1929 "Star Dust," originally an instrumental, also was a slow starter but really took off after Mitchell Parish added a lyric. "Star Dust," "Beguine," "Tea For Two" and "St. Louis Blues" are the most prolifically recorded tunes in pop song history.

W. C. Handy's "St. Louis Blues," from its original 1914 cradling in Memphis, is of the same pure Americana jazz strain as "Alexander's Ragtime Band" and will remain symbolic of the wealth of American Negro music that has become part of our musical heritage.

"Tea For Two," circa 1924, by Irving Caesar (words) and Vincent Youmans (music), from a modest Broadway musical, "No No Nanette," has been the perennial boy-meets-girl "double number." Countless "bench acts" in vaudeville—the dapper juvenile, usually avec strawhat and cane, and the sweet ingenue, usually in flouncy lace and avec parasol—have glorified this dream of young love. And almost 40 years later it got a big play as a chacha.

"Tenderly" had an inauspicious start but snowballed with increasing impact, first as a particular favorite of the nitery chanteuses, and in recent years this Jack Lawrence-Walter Gross ballad has been reprised in countless albums and versions, instrumental and vocal.

Legit Fountainhead

As this Top Pops roster indicates, legit has been the springboard of some of the richer heritages of the American popular music scene and the following will achieve similar distinction. Some already have. Among them are "Some Enchanted Evening," "People Will Say We're In Love," "I Could Have Danced All Night," "June Is Busting Out All Over," "On The Street Where You Live," "Mack The Knife" ("Moritat"), "Summertime," "If I Loved You," "All The Things You Are," "There's No Business Like Show Business," "Where Or When," "Makin' Whoopee." In fact, a glance at the VARIETY Music Cavalcade will produce dozens of tunes by Porter, Rombergs, Friml, Gershwin, Berlin, Rodgers & Hart, Youmans, Rodgers & Hammerstein, Lerner & Loewe, Hirsch, Stamper, Hubbell, Dietz & Schwartz, Loesser, DeSylva, Brown & Henderson, Merrill and others which would also qualify in this category.

Evergreen Ballads

Smash ballads that have lasted are of the calibre of "Till We Meet Again," "Memories," "Poor Butterfly," "My Buddy," "Beautiful Ohio," "Three O'Clock In The Morning," "When You and I Were Young Maggie," "Sidewalks of New York," "Down by the Old Mill Stream," "Isle of Capri," "South of the Border," "Paradise," among many more.

Periodically revived have been such perennial pops as "California Here I Come," "Avalon," "Remember," "That Old Gang of Mine," "Laura," "Winter Wonderland" (another Christmas perennial), "Santa Claus Is Coming To Town," "Third Man Theme," and many others. This list, too, is far from complete.

More Global Hits

The global cycle, especially post-World War II, spawned such international favorites as "La Vie En Rose," "The Seine," "Autumn Leaves," "At Last," "Lisbon Antigua," "April In Portugal," "Torero," "Cia Cia Bambino," "Under Paris Skies," "A Paris," "Poor People of Paris," "Never On Sunday," "Volare" and others. The last-named tune was so popular at one stage that the Brill Bldg. denizens dubbed it "Mussolini's revenge." In another era, when the John Golden-Raymond Hubbell ballad was equally overly familiar, a coupe of Tin Pan Alleyites whipped up an "answer" song, "I'd Like To Catch The Guy Who Wrote 'Poor Butterfly.'"

The music business is replete with cycles and frequently a social evolution, as with the Latin dance vogue, creates greater receptivity for such old and new standards as "Siboney," "Granada," "Green Eyes," "Valencia," "Amor," "Peanut Vendor," "Rum and Coca-Cola," "You Belong To My Heart," "Brazil," "Bahia," "Frenesi," "Besame Mucho," "Malaguena" and the like.

Pop music also traditionally reflects the moods and mores of the times. It may be the religioso, such as "I Believe" and "He's Got The Whole World In His Hands." It may be George M. Cohan's "Over There," "Yankee Doodle Dandy," "Mary's A Grand Old Name."

Instrumentals

It includes great instrumentals. Right up there with "St. Louis Blues" would be "Nola," "12th St. Rag," "Livery Stable Blues," "Memphis Blues," "Kitten On The Keys," "Canadian Capers," "Indianola," "Ragging The Scale," "In The Mood," "Mood Indigo," "Canadian Sunset," "Deep Purple," among others. And, on a grander scale, Gershwin's "Rhapsody In Blue" and Grofe's "Grand Canyon Suite."

And always it includes the zanyisms of a period of which "Purple People Eater," "Splish-Splash" and "Itsy Bitsy Teenie Weenie Yellow Polka Dot Bikini" are samplings.

When historians hark back to the frenetic '50s with its plethora of country music and rock 'n' roll, representative of that era will be such items as "Tennessee Waltz," "Blue Suede Shoes," "Rock Around The Clock," "Earth Angel" and "Hound Dog," for example. And now it's The Twist.

Still Others

And still others come to mind as durable standards, big sellers in their heyday, and constantly being revived and reprised, for this or that interpretation, album, filmusical synchronization, video period songs, etc. Among the would come such other titles as "Carolina Moon," "The Best Things In Life Are Free," "Chamaine," "Diane," "Jeannine (I Dream of Lilac Time)," "Ramona," "My Wonderful One," "I'm Forever Blowing Bubbles," "I'm Always Chasing Rainbows," "Paradise," "Dream Love Song," "Sin

Music Rights—Another Vestige Of U.S. Cultural Downgrading

Reasons for Much Needed Copyright Revision—ASCAP's General Counsel Comments on the Register's Report

By HERMAN FINKELSTEIN

The report of the Register of Copyrights on proposals for revision of the Copyright Law was the most important single event of interest to the copyright fraternity during the past year. In a related field, so-called "Neighboring Rights," a convention was formulated at Rome last October, but there is little likelihood of ratfication by the U.S. in the foreseeable future.

The year ahead will find serious consideration being given to the Register's Report on Copyright Revision. The next step will be the drafting of legislation to implement that report. The Register's recommendations for changes in the Copyright Law of 1909 are regarded as only tentative at this time. One of the most important recommendations is that the existing term of copyright be extended for an additional period of 20 years. In last year's annual issue of VARIETY I presented the reasons for enlarging the term of copyright, and shall not discuss that part of the Register's recommendations at this time.

From the point of view of the creator of musical works, two other proposals in the Report represent important advances:

(1) The elimination of the compulsory license provision which now permits all phonograph record manufacturers to record any copyrighted musical composition without securing the copyright owner's consent, for the price of 2c. which frequently is never paid;

(2) The elimination of the exemption for performances by means of coin-operated machines —the so-called jukebox exemption.

In recommending that the compulsory license provision be eliminated, the Register states:

"The compulsory license provisions are rather severe in their effect upon the copyright owner. Once he exploits his right to record his music, he is deprived of control over further recordings. He cannot control their quality nor can he select the persons who will make them. There have been many complaints of inferior recordings and of recordings by financially irresponsible persons. What is perhaps even more important, the statute places a ceiling of 2c. per record on the royalty he can obtain. In essence, the compulsory licence permits anyone indiscriminately to make records of the copyright owner's music at the 2c. rate fixed in the statute."

The Register points out that the record companies argue that the existing system insures a greater number of recordings of those works that are successful, but that the author's and publishers answer that "the possibility of granting an exclusive license might give new and unknown authors more opportunity to have their works recorded."

With respect to the Jukebox exemption, the Report makes these interesting observations:

"The jukebox exemption is a historical anomaly. The exemption was placed in the law in 1909 at the last minute with virtually no discussion. The coin-operated music machines of that day were apparently a novelty of little economic consequence. The jukebox industry is now among the largest commercial users of music, with an annual gross revenue of over a half billion dollars.

"Jukebox operators are the only users of music for profit who are not obliged to pay royalties, and there is no special reason for their exemption. No such exemption is made in any other country, except that in Canada the playing of music on jukeboxes comes within a general exemption of performances by means of a gramophone. A Canadian commission appointed to review its copyright law recently declared that the exemption of jukeboxes is not warranted, but that since the royalties collected in Canada would go mainly to copyright owners in the United States, the withdrawal of the exemption in Canada might await like action in our country."

Reforms Long Overdue

Both these reforms have been long overdue. The Register of Copyrights is to be applauded for espousing them.

There are other parts of the Report, however, which leave much to be desired. For example, it is proposed that there be added certain new exemptions in favor of users, which are not contained in the existing law, namely:

(a) Recommending that "The statute should exempt the mere reception of broadcasts from the public performances right, except where the receiver makes a charge to the public for such reception." This would allow commercial establishments to escape payment for public performances by means of music furnished to their patrons through loudspeakers connected with radio receiving sets, even though such use is both public and for profit.

(b) Allowing charitable enterprises to make free use of copyrighted music to raise funds by giving public performances of musical works and charging admission fees to the public. This too is not permitted under existing law.

Taking up first the proposal—to exempt public reproduction of radio broadcasts—there is no indication of what is meant by "mere reception" as used in the proposal. Is "mere reception" to be defined as including only the home-type receiving set without any added loudspeakers, or would it include reproduction over several loudspeakers? The Report does not define the nature of the "charge" which will prevent the performance from qualifying for the exemption, but it would seem to indicate that the exemption would apply even if there was a cover charge or hat-check charge or a charge for food or beverage. The Report expressly states that it would not exempt such performances if there was "an admission charge" or a fee for operating the receiving set. Does "admission charge" mean only a charge where money is taken at the door? If so, it would seem to be an arbitrary distinction.

How It Works Out

If the proprietor spends the money to install loudspeakers, he must find that it stimulates the sale of food or beverages. The user's benefits are apt to be just as great as if there were an admission charge, however small. As Mr. Justice Holmes said in Herbert v. Shanley:

"If the rights under the copyright are infringed only by a performance where money is taken at the door they are very imperfectly protected. Performances not different in kind from those of the defendants could be given that might compete with and even destroy the success of the monopoly that the law intends the plaintiffs to have . . . The defendants' performances are not eleemosynary. They are part of a total for which the public pays, and the fact that the price of the whole is attributed to a particular item which those present are expected to order is not important. It is true that the music is not the sole object, but neither is the food, which probably could be got cheaper elsewhere. The object is a repast in surroundings that to people having limited powers of conversation or disliking the rival noise give a luxurious pleasure not to be had from eating a silent meal. If music did not pay it would be given up. If it pays out of the public's pocket. Whether it pays or not the purpose of employing it is profit and that is enough."

In discussing the existing law, the Register concedes that the unauthorized reproduction of a broadcast of a musical work in a public room in a hotel is an infringing use under the decision of the Supreme Court in Buck v. Jewell-LaSalle Realty Co., 283 U.S. 191 (1931). The Report states, however (pp. 30-31):

"As a practical matter this problem has been confined so far to broadcasts of music, though it could conceivably arise also as to broadcasts of dramatic and literary works and even of motion pictures. We understand that the two principal organizations controlling the performing rights in music (ASCAP and BMI) have generally followed the policy of confining their demands for license fees to those establishments, such as the hotel in the Jewell-La Salle case, that retransmit broadcasts to their various rooms. Other similar organizations, however, may not have the same policy. And there have been complaints from some small establishments that they were asked to obtain performing licenses for the mere operation of receiving sets. In any event, the free use of receiving sets should not be left to the grace or forbearance of the performing rights organizations or other copyright owners."

This statement does not correctly set forth the policy of ASCAP. I know nothing about the practice of other performing right organizations. ASCAP has seen fit not to charge for the reception of music in the hotel's individual guest rooms, even though the programs available to the guests are controlled by a master set, nor has it charged for music in public rooms of hotels or in other public places such as restaurants or stores if there are no loudspeakers other than the one normally found in a single ordinary home-type device employed on the premises. If, however, there are several loudspeakers in public places operated for commercial gain, the use is often more effective than a single live instrumentalist or a phonograph. The Register concedes that in the latter cases a charge may be made if the performance is in public and for profit.

The mechanization of music has seriously affected the opportunities of musicians and composers. A Congressional hearing recently examined the possibility of finding remedies, including serious proposals that the living arts be subsidized in our national interest. Composers and other copyright owners would much rather collect only from those who use their works, than to tax the general public as a means of securing encouragement. The proposal that copyright owners be denied the right to charge for the use of canned music under circumstances where it would be appropriate and necessary to charge for live music, moves in a direction which is contrary to the public interest. It would give an added incentive to displace the live performer. This is certainly not desirable.

One of the reasons given by the Register for exempting public performances by "the mere reception of broadcasts" is that "complaints from some small establishments" have been received with respect to one unregulated licensing organization. If a remedy is needed, it lies in proper regulation of the rates of all licensing organizations. The Register has touched on this in Chapter XI E of the Report (pp. 136-138), but he states: "We have made no study of this problem [regulation of performing rights organizations] since we believe it is beyond the range of the present project for revision of the copyright law . . ."

The proposed exemption is illogical and economically unsound. Purveyors of wired music and of FM background music services pay for such reproduction. They generally clear at the source for their subscribers. These uses can be licensed at the source because the ultimate user must have an agreement with the "source" in order to use the music lawfully. This also applies to network broadcasts which are "cleared" for stations affiliated with the network, and to the exhibition of motion picture films in theatres which have leased them from the producer of the film. The private operator who taps the airwaves without any contract with the broadcasting station cannot expect that station to clear the program "at the source" for him.

Charitable Enterprises

Now let us turn to the proposed new exemption for performances by charitable enterprises which would apply even where the public pays for admission. No such performances are now exempt if someone receives payment in connection with the performance.

Actually, the statute should be changed by giving broader rights to musical works rather than granting broader exemptions to users.

There is no reason why a composer of a symphony should have any lesser protection for performances of his works than authors of dramatic works. Yet the existing law does not protect the composer of a symphony unless a performance of his work is both public and for profit, whereas the author of a dramatic work is protected against performances whether or not they are for profit. Both types of works should be protected against public performances regardless of the profit element. They are so protected throughout the world.

Incidentally, careful research has not disclosed a single lawsuit for infringement of performing rights before the statue narrowed the composer's right. Except for the expectation of commercial users that their performances would be regarded as not "for profit" if no admission fees were charged, it is difficult to see what type of user expected to get something under the 1909 limitation, that he was not previously enjoying as a matter of practice.

The Register justifies the narrower grant of performing rights to composers imposing the "for profit" limitation) than to dramatic works on the following grounds (page 28 of the Report):

"The audience at a nonprofit performance of a dramatic work is less likely to pay to attend another performance than is the case with nondramatic works.

"Public performance is usually the main source of revenue from a dramatic work; in the case of nondramatic works, revenue is also available from the sale of copies and sound recordings.

"Dramatic works are not as readily or as frequently performed for charitable, educational and similar purposes as are nondramatic works."

Every composer of a symphony or concerto from Beethoven to Barber knows:

That the audience at a first performance of his work is not likely to attend another performance of that work during the same season, and often not for many years thereafter;

That the public performance income, limited as it is, is greater than that from the sale of copies and sound recordings;

That their works are more readily and more frequently performed for alleged "charitable, educational, and similar purposes" without payment than are dramatic works; and that authors of dramatic works have substantial incomes from both professional and amateur performances which are denied to the composers of symphonies.

There is no reason to downgrade musical works. Composers have the same needs, appetites and desires as other authors. Their struggles for recognition and survival are just as intense. If their works are attractive to the public, they should be entitled to compensation —especially where most of the uses are by those who fly under the banner of philanthropy. A composer should be free to contribute his work to the cause of charity, or to withhold it if he cannot afford to make the gift. Unless an equal tithe is exacted of others, it should not be exacted from the composer.

We hope the Register of Copyrights will take these problems of the composer into consideration when final proposals for copyright reform are made.

Japan's Sun Rises In West's Music; A Revolution

By TOSHIYA ETO

When I first came to the United States in 1948 to study with Efrem Zimbalist at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute of Music and went on to make my Carnegie Hall debut three years later, I was a surprise to a great many people—an Oriental capable of interpreting the violin masterpieces of such typically Western composers as Bach and Mozart. But two summers ago, when I returned to my homeland after a decade's absence, in the peculiar position of observing Japan's musical life for the first time through Americanized eyes, I must confess that I was the one who was surprised to note the great crescendo of enthusiasm for Western music which is rising in Japan.

Record sales are booming, with many of the world's major labels represented as member companies of the Japanese Phonograph & Record Assn.

Western orchestras and concert artists on tour have found highly receptive audiences all over the Orient, but nowhere more so than in Japan. The growing enthusiasm for classical music has been fostered largely by the country's youth, but any "man on the street" knows the name of Beethoven, shoppers are treated to continual symphonics over department store loudspeakers and radio and television commentators proclaim the day's news accompanied by "long-hair" sound asks.

Compulsory Music!

The Japanese government is contemplating making either violin or piano study compulsory in all schools.

Musical instruments used to be rather inferior in Japan, at least by Western standards, but recent improvements in manufacture by such firms as Yamaha, long the foremost Japanese piano makers, have brought new vigor to the industry. A good upright piano can now be had for about the yen equivalent of $300, while a violin of satisfactory quality may be purchased for $15.

A Nipponese musician makes a fine living today in the practice of his craft, earning more than some college professors and finding year-round employment in local orchestras. Such ensembles as the NHK Symphony—sponsored by a government-controlled radio station—and the renowned Japan Philharmonic provide an excellent income from concerts, radio-television appearances and recordings. This situation contrasts sharply with that prevailing in the U. S. where few major orchestras can offer the security of unbroken seasons and annual stipends.

My countrymen have long been famed for their versatility in imitating the ways of other lands, in adapting Western know-how to Oriental needs. Having for years exported much of the world's complex scientific and industrial equipment and novelty goods of all descriptions, they are now sending out their young musicians in a cultural exchange between East and West. These artists must first overcome a number of inborn psychological factors—the thirty centuries of discipline and rigid traditionalism which tend to inhibit both the response to and the performing of classical masterpieces. With typical Japanese intellectual curiosity, for example, young violinists up to the age of 18 diligently explore and master basic elements of Western music but then lack the ability to register the necessary emotion in its performance.

The challenge has been met and conquered by such recent visitors to the U. S. as Seiji Ozawa, currently one of Leonard Bernstein's assistant conductors with the New York Philharmonic, Kunie Imai, soprano star of the Metropolitan's recent authentically-Japanese production of "Madama Butterfly" and Yoshio Aoyama, the director who staged this widely acclaimed new version of Puccini's masterpiece.

STUNTS PASS, CONCERTS GO ON

Disk Business In 3 Words: Original Cast Albums

By GLENN E. WALLICHS
(President, Capitol Records)

As we at Capitol close out 1961 and head hopefully into the new year, we find our thoughts once again centered about those three not so-little words, "original Broadway cast."

This is only natural, for—like the other major firms in our industry—we find ourselves drawn irresistibly (it seems) to Broadway and to the promised land of original-cast albums. As though having released three original-cast albums already this season weren't enough ("Sail Away," "The Gay Life" and "Kwamina"), we received one of the nicest Christmas presents any company could ask for: original-cast rights to Richard Rodgers' first words-and-music effort, "No Strings."

And so in 1961-1962, we are privileged to bring to the American record-buying public the works of such eminent Broadway talents as Noel Coward, Arthur Schwartz & Howard Dietz, Fay & Michael Kanin, Richard Adler and now Richard Rodgers and Samuel Taylor. We find ourselves caught up in the traditional excitement, drama and glamour of a Broadway season—and we like it. Naturally.

But a business cannot be sustained solely on excitement, drama and glamour. Which brings up the question for which I shall try to provide an answer in this short piece: just how important, from a business standpoint, are original-cast albums? Everybody seems to want them—but are they worth having?

The answer to this question is deceptively simple: "Yes."

A quick check of a recent VARIETY best seller chart shows that 15 out of the top 50 albums—fully 30%—were either original Broadway-cast, motion-picture soundtrack (first cousin to a show album) or derived in some way from shows or films. A company like Capitol, Columbia or Victor often owes 20% or more of its current pop sales to this category or product, and you don't have to be an accountant to know that—where chart performance is concerned—you can't do much better than a "South Pacific" (393 weeks on the charts), a "My Fair Lady" (298 weeks) or a "Music Man" (198 weeks).

This Season's Entries

This season, a number of the new shows are already hot chart items: "Sail Away," "Milk and Honey," and "How To Succeed etc."—with perhaps a half-dozen more destined to find best seller status before Broadway encounters the summer doldrums. From a catalog standpoint, original-cast albums—of which there are over 70 currently available—are extraordinarily long-lived. In a day when an average pop album may appear in January and be deleted in December, show albums exhibit fabulous vitality. "South Pacific," to choose the best possible example, is over a dozen years old.

In summary, then—aside from such phenomena as a "Judy Garland at Carnegie Hall," or a "Sing Along with Mitch" series or a string of albums from an Elvis Presley, original-cast and soundtrack albums are the most exciting things that ever happen to the record business.

Negative Side

There is a negative side, too. In fairness, we must remember that such promising creations as "Kwamina" and "Let It Ride" have already bitten the dust this season. Yet, the original-cast albums remain — evidence of much that was fresh and inventive and even brilliant about those late-lamented properties. (Capitol recorded its original-cast album of "Kwamina" two days after the show had closed—an act of faith, and perhaps even charity unparalleled in the annals of show business.)

Is sale success, then, the real measure of an original-cast album? I think no—though I am not the least bit opposed to sales success. If original-cast albums are more than financial propositions, they are nothing less than the systematic documentation of the history of the American musical theatre. As such, they possess aesthetic values not related simply to boxoffice. Original-cast albums allow us, at this late date, to look back and sample the national taste of years gone by. The variety is fabulous. The interest is undying. The significance is unquestioned and unquestionable.

Vital Art Form

Somehow, when dealing with original-cast albums, you feel that you're doing more than just making records. In an important way, you feel that you're participating in the growth and development of one of America's most original, rewarding and vital art forms. It's a good feeling—and one that we at Capitol intend to nurture in seasons to come.

Status of Disks Among Germans

By HANS HOEHN

Berlin.

The recording industry again proved last year to be the best branch of German show business.

Now as before, half a dozen diskeries rule the land. They are Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft, Teldec, Electrola, Philips, Metronome and Ariola. All are linked with important stateside labels.

While still a few years ago, Deutsche Grammophon's pop label, Polydor, dominated half of the domestic market, leaving such companies as Philips and Metronome far behind, the German disk scene now shows a mixed picture. No diskery really dominates anymore.

An obvious trend towards sentimental and melodious music was one of the most noteworthy aspects last year, according to Guenther Birner, 23-year-old Berlin pop composer, who landed with "Schade, schade, schade" (sung by Siw Malmkvist). Young Birner, who's been in the local music biz for around five years and during which he's composed some 200 songs (of which, however, only one—his "Schade, schade, schade"—really clicked so far), opined that the popularity of U.S. singers has been on the decline in Germany within the past years, while more and more German recording stars have taken over the leading positions.

Two Connies Click

Interesting to note that a number of U.S. singers tried their luck with songs in German last year. The two Connies, Francis and Stevens, were pretty successful in this respect. Their German-language songs climbed the domestic hit parade. "The German public is sometimes rather strange," a local songwriter said. "It shows a like for native songs with a foreign accent." This is clearly evidenced by the successes of such singers as Chris Howland and Bill Ramsey. Both on the payroll of German diskeries, they came along with a good number of top hits last year. Howland is a Britisher, Ramsey an American.)

Bill Ramsey, Gus Backus (like Ramsey a former G.I. and Teddy Wilson are some of the Americans who reached prominence here. The Scandinavian share is particularly big. The Swedes Siw Malmkvist, Bibi Johns and nowadays Lill-Babs Svensson have reached a fine grade of popularity in Germany, not to forget such oldtimers as Alice Babs and Zarah Leander who still have their public. Denmark contributed such an allround talent as Boyd Bachmann, the calypso duo Nina & Frederik, the juveniles Jan & Kjeld, a cutie by the name of Vivi Bach and such oldtimers as Lale Andersen and Svend Asmussen.

This list can be endlessly extended by such names as Vico Torriani (Swiss), Leo Leandros (Greek), Camillo Felgen (Luxembourg), Willy Hagara, Peter Alexander (both Austrian), the Blue Diamonds (Indonesia), Ivo Robic (Yugoslavia) just to name a few.

Reflecting upon the past 12 months, one can regard Freddy Quinn, who's also successful in German movies, Torriani, Peter Kraus (Germany's answer to Elvis), Peter Alexander, Ralph Bendix and the Americans Ramsey and Backus as this country's most successful diskery stars. In the female field, Caterina Valente and 19-year-old Heidi Bruehl, who walked off with a golden disk for her "Wir werden niemals auseinandergehn" ("We'll Never Part), held the top, with 18-year-old Connie (Froeboss) a pretty tight runnerup.

U.S. BIG MARKET FOR FINE MUSIC

By HERBERT BARRETT

The concert business with which I concern myself professionally today is considerably different from that which provided the treasurable listening experiences of my own star-struck youth not too many years ago. For those were the days — with television still a gleam in the eye of its inventor and cross-country travel a matter of days in non-air-conditioned Pullman compartments—when the legendary names of music, managed by the legendary impresarios, made their slow ways from one large city to another, their every in-person appearance a gala soldout event because there were relatively few of them, relatively few places where they could concertize and relatively little to compete with them in the way of mass entertainment. Those were the days of Kreisler and Hofmann, of Paderewski and Rachmaninoff, of Galli-Curci and Chaliapin.

Herbert Barrett

Then, in the 1930s, along with airliners which flew back and forth across the continent on hourly schedules, came the so-called "organized audience" plan — an ingenious system whereby a thousand or more farflung cities, some with populations under 10,000, were enabled to put on professional concert series for the first time. The slogan was "A Carnegie Hall in Every Town," and concert artists were bought and sold wholesale by the dozen. To fill the suddenly increased demand and service the new widespread market, individual managers, who had hitherto represented small lists of artists and concerned themselves with the most intimate details of a performer's life—from buying a primadonna's gown to doling out a virtuoso's alimony—joined forces to form large booking organizations. Concert management, once done out of the hat, was now definitely big business.

The manager was no longer a discoverer and slow builder of exceptional talent in which he had faith for the future; he was a seeker after the largest possible number of readily saleable attractions. He was no longer the individual artist's confidential adviser and full-time promoter; he was engaged in booking hundreds of artists in widely divergent fee categories with already proven potentials of appeal to a wide variety of tastes. Since he was catering to a new audience and competing, product-wise, against other mass entertainment media, he could no longer concentrate on the soloist presenting a wholly serious program that

That Inevitable Question: 'Which Comes First?'

Ira Gershwin Answers the Usual Query, Words Or Music First? In His 'Lyrics On Several Occasions' (Knopf; '59)

By IRA GERSHWIN

That Certain Question: "Which Comes First?" When I was on jury service in New York many years ago there was a case found for the defendant. Afterwards, in the corridor, I saw the lawyer for the plaintiff approaching and thought I was going to be lectured. But no. Greetings over, all he wanted to know was whether the words or the music came first.

Every songwriter has been put this question many times, and by now nearly all interested know that no rule obtains: sometimes it's the lyric and sometimes the tune. And sometimes—more often than not these days—the words and music are written practically at the same time: this, when collaborators are at work together in the same room, that is—though I have heard of collaboration on the telephone); and a song, sparked either by a possible title or by a likely snatch of tune, emerges line by line and section by section. (What comes first, according to show writers in demand, is the contract).

With the great art-song writers of the Elizabethan Age—John Dowland, Thomas Campion, half a dozen others), the words always came first, even though many of these highly talented men were also fine composers and wrote their own lute accompaniments.

But already in that period were numerous instances where lyrics were fitted to music. This was done by satirists and parodists who, discarding the words of folk song and ballad, penned—quilled, if you like—new lyrics to the traditional tunes—lyrics which politicized, thumbed the nose, eulogized, or went in for out-and-out bawdry. Lyric-transformation played quite a part also in early hymnody. In Germany, for instance, Martin Luther was a notable example of the hymnist who took many a secular song, well known to the people, and, retaining the tune, threw out the worldly lyric to substitute one of spiritual quality.

The practice of putting new words to pre-existent song became more and more common and led to the beginnings of ballad opera. England's outstanding opus in this realm was Gay's "The Beggar's Opera," London, 1728. This was so successful that it ran 62 nights, a new theatrical record that "stood unchallenged for almost a century." In the Heinemann edition (London, 1921) I count 68 short "airs"—chosen by Gay from the great store of English, Irish, and Scottish melodies—newly lyricized by the playwright.

Everyone knows that in the Gilbert-and-Sullivan operettas practically all the lyrics were written first. However, earlier in Gilbert's theatrical career he'd also had plenty of experience setting words to music. In the 1860s many extravaganzas and burlesques of his, based on Continental operas, were produced in London. These were adapted by him into English with tricky lyrics and recitatives loaded with puns. Among them were Meyerbeer's "Robert Le Diable," which became "Robert the Devil"; or "The Nun, and the Son of a Gun" and Bellini's "Norma," extravagandized to "The Pretty Druidess"; or "The Mother, the Maid and the Mistletoe Bough."

My favorite account of how songs are written was told me second-hand many years ago. At a Christmas party in a music-publishing house a shipping-clerk was explaining to an impressed friend how hit-writer Walter Donaldson (who had just written both the words and the music of a hit) went about it: "Well, you see—he sort of gets the scope of the thing and then scopes it out."

Big Hurdles And Coin Globally

By REG CONNELLY

London.

In the words of the late revered Oscar Hammerstein—"it's a puzzlement—today's music business, that is.

The way I see it, the whole setup is in process of being revamped, an uncomfortable experience for many. And yet the future offers a real challenge, great promise, and the ever-present excitement and fascination, without which I'm certain many of the most powerful contributors would have bowed out years ago.

I suppose broadly the business has always been concentrated in a few hands, in all the main countries. That is not to say great contributions haven't been made by numerous "small operators" with "a lead sheet and a shelf," as our old friend Jack Robbins so succinctly put it.

What does appear essential, is that the few groups at present controlled and operated by fully experienced music men, should continue so in the future, and not be administered by individuals lacking that intangible but unmistakable music business feeling.

Need Adaptability

By one means or another modern music men must have, not only the aptitude and experience of the past, but adaptability and determination to find ways whereby the new pops can become hits, and so established. The means to do this certainly exist, and bringing them all into line in the relatively short space of time before interest wanes, must somehow be accomplished.

At present, and quite understandably, writers of this calibre are of necessity concerned primarily with "tailoring" a particular record artist, or meeting the wishes of a record man. They can rarely afford the luxury of the longterm approach by producing songs of general quality, although it's significant the greatest ambition of the majority is to create hits that subsequently develop standard appeal.

In the case of show or production writers, and composers of film scores, the hazards are less. There is continuity of performance with successful shows and films sufficient to keep good songs or themes "alive" for sufficient time so the public can get to know them. Substantial additional benefits also derive from LP and other recorded uses of popular show music.

World Is Your Oyster

The world is certainly your oyster; today where music is concerned. Back in the tuneful '30s, I realized the immense potential of West to East interchange traffic where writers were concerned. Gordon & Revel, Sigler Goodhart & Hoffman, Harry Woods & Arthur Johnston were among the top writers that I brought to London to write show and film scores. In reverse order, top British writers provided hits of the calibre of "Goodnight Sweetheart," "Underneath The Arches," "If I Had You," "Lambeth Walk" and "Let's All Sing Like The Birdies Sing" to top the U.S. hit parade. What proved lucrative for all concerned in that era of great songs can blossom and broaden out of all measure in the present "jet" age, if the opportunities are seized.

Writers in every country are striving to hit that world jackpot. We've seen an unknown Greek composer, Hadjidakis, become internationally famous overnight with "Never On Sunday."

Songs As Stereotypes And Caricatures

Laws of the Land and Customs of Nations Stem From Its Popular Paeans

By IRVING CAESAR

Make it "light, bright or serious," wrote the Editor when he asked for 1,500 to 2,500 words for the Anniversary Number. In selecting my subject it at once occurred to me that here was a theme that combined, indeed could not be discussed without, a liberal admixture of these three shades of reflection summoned by recalling a category of popular song that has all but passed from the scene.

Now what is a stereotype? It is, on the authority of Webster, "a fixed or conventional expression, notion, mental pattern, etc." Some excellent examples are: "Uncle Tom," Babbitt in Sinclair Lewis' "Main Street," the Lindy coterie in Runyon's "Guys And Dolls," and in the visual art—Thomas Nast's caricature of the Tammany Hall Boss, beady-eyed, of bulbous nose and obese form, cutaway garment draped around him, surrounded by his sycophantic camp followers, no doubt singing "Tammany, Tammany, Big Chief sits in his tepee . . ." which brings us to the stereotype in song.

Inasmuch as a song, when it is nationwide in popularity, provides us with a clue to what the average person is in tune with at the time, a study and appraisal of the history of a people can no more omit the songs it sang, than its food, its housing, its church attendance, its daily labor, and its amusements.

This one category of the popular song, the caricature and stereotype, parallels closely the great migrations of the post-Civil War era, when audiences in music halls, beerstube, vaudeville theatres and burlesque houses found much to laugh at in the lyric that liltingly focussed attention on and mirrored the Old World customs, idiosyncracies, physiognomies, in short, the differences that distinguished the newly arrived German, Irish, Jewish and Italian immigrant, in the same manner that many of the songs of a Stephen Foster and James Bland, and some written after the turn of the century, created for us an image of the "darkie" and his "massa."

And for the most part many were the works of those who were at best one generation removed from the "landsmann" the song pilloried. No, "pilloried" is not the word. They were never planned or meant to be downgrading or cruel even though a sensitive soul here and there might have found some slight embarrassment in the caricature. It was as a rule an attempt at humor, tongue-in-cheek self portrayal, that minorities have through the years indulged in and passively endured until taking their place and rising in the economic and political structure of the day, a newly arrived minority comes upon the scene.

The Irish

If you had the 10c. admission to Tony Pastor's in the late '90s or the early years of the present century, you might have been regaled by, "I Don't Like the Irish But I'd Like Someone to Say as Much" and here we have a fine specimen of the stereotype of the period.

Hofmeister gave a party, 'twas held last Thursday night,
In honor of the Scheutzenbund's big score.
The band and all were Germans, except one Irishman,
And that was Slattery who lives next door.
The rhein-wine and the lager beer like water flowed about,
The' Slatt'ry drank his fill of both the Germans shut him out.
He couldn't understand them, though it was meant to slight
And this is what he shouted . . . for Slatt'ry wanted fight!

Refrain:

I don't like the Irish!
But I'd like some one to say as much.
There's one thing you must give them credit for—
'Tis the knack they have of handling the Dutch—
Read the history of nations
Irishmen will point to it with pride
Few heroes therein mentioned couldn't sing
Down by the tanyard side.

Some references in the lyric escape me but there is no mistaking the author's pride in the 24-hour preparedness and willingness on the part of the Irish, a much maligned and downgraded minority of the day to prove itself superior, at least in a good brawl. So it goes with "Throw Him Down McCloskey," "Remember Boy, You're Irish," "Paddy Flynn" and so many others in the Maggie Cline repertoire. In the refrain of "Paddy Flynn," Maggie shouted:

Will ye's all be with me when I tackle Paddy Flynn?
(Response) We will.
Will ye's all be there when the scrap begins?
(Response) Yes!
Let us all be there for the fight is on the square.
I'll make a mop of him tomorrow morning.

That was the "chip on the shoulder" stage in the assimilation of the hearty folk from Erin and before their integration in the political, economic and social pattern of an industrialized United States. However, it is a far cry and a long journey from Al Smith's apprenticeship in the fish market off Oliver Street to the nation's Capitol, or for that matter the many state Capitols, and countless City Halls where the second or third generation Paddy Flynns and McGintys and McCloskeys need no longer to seek status by wielding a shillelagh.

The Jews

As with the Irish stereotype so with the Yiddish. They were often referred to as "Jew comedy songs" and enjoyed their heyday some three generations ago, the era of Joe and Ben Welch, Julian Rose, Frank Bush, kept alive until the middle twenties by the superb artistry of a Belle Baker, Ruth Roye, Lillian Shaw, a Jimmy Hussey, Sophie Tucker and others of course. I will not dwell on the comparatively recent "Yiddishe Mama," like "Mother Machree," "Mammy o' Mine" prototypes of the serious stereotype, as compared with the majority of those meant as comedy songs. I would however revive for you a song that as a little child I heard (and never forgot except for a word or two) when a friend of the family, a barber down the street holding a pass for two as a reward for the billpost in his window, led me by the hand into the Miner's Theatre on the Bowery:

So you're going away with an Irish loafer,
What a sad disgrace for the race!
Whaddye going to do when the wedding is over
How you gonna look me in the face?
Oy, will you cry, when you eat corned beef and cabbages,
Oy, will you cry, when you lose your little Abie boy,
your baby boy, oy-oy . . . oy!

Refrain
Won't you come and make for me a happy life,
I got plenty money to support a wife,
It's not a business to be single, let's mingle,
jingle, jingle,
We'll have a happy, happy, jubilee,
UNDER THE MATZOH TREE!

Or you may prefer . . .
Nat'an and Rosalie
They both kept company
They kept company for six long years,
And ev'ry time she'd ask him
"When will you marry me?"
He said "I don't make enough salary."
Each time Nat'an tried to kiss her
Rosalie cried . . .
Refrain
Natan, Natan,
Tell me for what are you waitin'
Nat'an you said "We'll marry in June, my dear,"
You told me the month—but you didn't say the year,
My whole family, they keep asking me, Noo? When?
And I don't know what to tell them,
Natan, Natan, Natan,
I'm sick and tired of waitin', Natan,
Ev'ry minute seenis like ages
I can't wait till you make heavy wages,
Natan, Natan—what are you waitin' for?

The Evolutionary Process

But the year is 1962 and "Chaim," like Time, marches on. Thus the romantic maiden grown weary of waitin' for Natan, and harassed by the family's unremitting solicitude, would no doubt be spending the weekend at Grossinger's or the Concord, and would soon be "going steady" with the hero of the Matzoh Tree saga we heard berating his inamorata for running off with that "Irisher loafer." Who would laugh at "Tough guy, Levi, that's my name and I'm a Yiddishe cowboy" when seated not on a bronco, but behind that Jaguar is the heir to Levi's fortune, fresh out of Leland Stanford, slashing his way across the desert for a Las Vegas rendezvous with the sexagonal dominoes that gallop.

How can we sing, "My Mariucca taka de steamboat . . . shez a gonna back to de old countree . . . she make 21, 22, skidoo" when the daughter of Mariucca is enjoying a leave of absence from teaching languages at Vassar, or clerking in Wall Street, or is celebrating the millionth album sold of her latest recordings, and has long since turned her back on steamboats for that jet that is winging her down to the Caribbean for the Easter Holidays?

This is getting to be fun. Let's see! Aren't those the great-grandchildren of Old Black Joe who have just been seated alongside the blonde youth in that Little Rock classroom? And that young colored physician, Dr. R. Brown, fresh out of Cornell, secure now in his own two-level in suburbia . . . isn't he somehow related to one Rufus Rastus Johnson Brown who never knew what to "do when the rent come roun'?"

Sounds of the Times

There are those who would forever silence the songs that sometimes, with travesty, extravagance and distortion, but seldom with cruel mockery, revealed the social stratification of their times. This would be a disservice to the history of their time.

It is a pity that no oldfashioned minstrel show or faithful vaudeville presentation of the early 1900s would receive serious consideration for a telecast by any of the networks because many of the song caricatures and stereotypes that were an integral part of the performance would today raise a censorious howl of protest by the vanishing remnant of a thin-skinned minority. So today these works gather dust on the shelves of the Music Room of the New York Public Library, and other libraries, perhaps, or in the attic of a collector here and there, for the scholar to pore over and one day descend on us with his magnum opus . . . "An Economic, Social and Ethnic Interpretation of the Stereotype and Caricature in Song."

The good Professor and I would, I think, agree that in the past two generations we have become used to each others differences, we have got to know each other, a little of each has rubbed off on each of us and so we have taken on a homogeneity. Also thanks to intensive industrializing and mass production, we own cars, most of them the same, we buy the same clothes, the same shoes, the same hats, are exposed to the same entertainments and diversions, have the same thought patterns created for us by the mass media . . . radio, television, magazines and newspapers with their widely syndicated columns. We fare on the same packaged labelled foods and on the nights we dine out, it is Chinese food one night, Italian the next, kosher the third, French, Armenian, Greek, Spanish, German, Russian and what have you! Few today would laugh at reference to a pizza or a knish. Veritably a Culinary One World!

And most important we are beginning to speak the same language, English, without accent and a minimum of colloquialism, and in our back door the U. N. itself.

It is beginning to dawn on us that in the world today we, the Caucasians are the minority and that it no longer makes sense to sing . . . "All coons look alike to me" because with more truth and logic the African and Asian could reply . . . "All whites look alike to me" as indeed we do. "Sadie Horowitz, tell me which is whitz" has lost its humor in a country where little children at school are being taught to sing:

A "ski" or "off" or "witz" or "cu"
When added to a name,
Just teaches us the family or town from which it came,
A name like Thomas Jefferson in some lands o'er the sea,
Would not be Thomas Jefferson but Thomas Jefferski,
Or Jefferwitz, or Jefferoff or even Jeffercu.
So do not let a "ski" or "witz" or "off" seem strange to you,
I feel the same towards every name no matter how it ends,
For people with the strangest names can be the best of friends.

A Life Term For Authors

76 Years or Lifetime Protection (Whichever Is Greater) for Writers

By PHILIP WITTENBERG

There is a ferment in the air of all those fields which depend on the copyright law for the basic protection of property. Since 1957 some 34 studies have been prepared for the subcommittees of Congress on the revision of the copyright law. The Register of Copyrights has prepared a report on the general revision of the copyright law, which was submitted in July of this year to the House of Representatives.

In that report the Register of Copyrights characterizes copyright as a unique kind of property. One of the principal things that makes it unique is the fact that though the author and all those who hold under him have a kind of property it is not a property for life but for a limited term. In a society that depends on property and its acquisition most of us like to think that our rights in property are inherent for our lives and those of our descendants. Copyright is not even for a life term in the United States but is limited to a term of 28 years with a renewal period of 28 years. Why can't the author and those who depend upon him for their rights have at least a lifetime of property?

The whole trouble started with the Constitution, which provided in Article I, (8):

"The Congress shall have Power . . . To Promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries."

Even before the Constitution was adopted the Colonial Congress on May 2, 1783, had recommended to the several states that they pass a copyright protecting books for 14 years. Connecticut, Maryland, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia and New York did this. Massachusetts fixed a term of 21 years, as did Rhode Island and Virginia. New Hampshire fixed on 20 years.

After the Constitution was adopted the Congress of the United States, in its first copyright act, Ch. 15, (2), provided for a term of 14 years with a renewal term of 14 years, making in all 28 years. In the amendments of 1871 they increased the first term of 28 years, but kept the second term at 14 years. It was not until 1909 that an act was passed providing for the present term of 28 years with a renewal of 28 years, making in all 56 years.

New Proposal: 76 Years

Now the Register proposes that the act provide for a term of 28 years with a renewal term of 48 years, making in all 76 years, despite the fact that with practical unanimity the rest of the countries of the world protect copyright during the author's lifetime at least.

The argument is made that the United States ought not use the author's lifetime as a term of copyright because of the difficulties of ascertaining the date of death of the author. The important thing is the author's protection during his lifetime. Is it an unnecessary hardship to impose upon those who would use the author's work, the burden of ascertaining whether or not he is alive or dead?
